a przed wypaniem "Cyklonu" wyciągano bowiem z komory powietrze, wentylacja komory nadawała się do tego celu. Był to system ssąco-tłoczący. Rozmiarówka miała tylko ssącą wentylację. Mimo, iż po otwarciu komory uruchamiano jej wentylację, w pierwszych chwilach po wejściu do niej gdy znajdowali się w komorze zagazowani, pracowaliśmy przy wydobywaniu zwłok w maskach gazowych. Związek z owego pierwszego transportu z połowy marca 1943 r. nie wynieśliśmy jednak z komory gazowej, ponieważ musieliśmy wrócić do obaluki pieców. Sproszono wówczas z bloku II 70-ciu więźniów, którzy należeli do Sonderkomanda i zatrudnieni byli przy paleniu zwłok w dołach na bunkrach. Grupa ta wyciągała zwłoki z komory gazowej na korytarz przy windzie, tu kobietom obcinał fryzjer włosy, a następnie wyciągano zwłoki windą na poziom hajoceni. Tu składano je w pokoju zapasowym na zwłoki, skąd zabieraliśmy je do pieców lub wynoszono na hajocenię i układano przed piecami. Tu dwaj dentysty pod kontrolą SS-mannów wyrywali metalowe sąby i sztuczne szczęki. Oni również ściągali ze zwłok pierścienki i wyjmowali kołozęby z uszu. Sąby trano do skrzyni oznaczonej napisem "Zahnarztstation", a kołozęby do drugiej skrzyni. Skrzynia ta nie miała żadnego napisu, tylko oznaczona była numerem. Dentysty, którzy rekrutowali się też z pośród więźniów zaglądali do ust każdego trupa z wyjątkiem dzieci. Gdy usta były zacięte, rozwierali szczęki obciągami, które służyły jednocześnie do wyrywania sąbów. Jak już wspomniałem praca dentystów była przez SS-mannów, asystujących przy tej czynności dokładnie kontrolowana. Co pewien czas wstrzymywali oni ładowanie do pieców zwłok obrabianych już przez dentystów, zaglądali do ust i zdarzały się wypadki, że stwierdzili istnienie niewyrwanego przez dentystów słotego sąba. Przecoczenie takie traktowane było jako sabotaż i winnego dentystę palono żywcem w piecu. Sam byłem świadkiem, jak dentystę tyda francuskiego spalono w ten sposób w krematorium V. Bronił się on i krzyczał, ale SS-manni, było ich kilku, oparli go, ubesiecznili i żywcem do pieca załadowali. Kara palenia żywcem była dla oszczeków Sonderkomanda dość częstą stosowaną, ale nie jedyną, gdyż prócz niej stosowano także i inne, jak roztrzaskiwanie na miazgę, wrzucanie do basenu z wodą, udę-oszenie fizyczne, bicia, taranie się gołym ci łem po twirze i t.p.

inne tortury. Kary te stosowano na oczach całej obsługi Sonderkomanda w celu odstraszania. Pamiętam również drugi wypadek, który miał miejsce na krematorium nr V w sierpniu 1944 r. Wówczas przy jednym ze zwykłych robotników, którym był syn pochodzący z Wolbromia, imieniem Lejb, w wieku około lat 20, niski, brunet, posiadający numer 1202000000 steżkiem tyłkoj z oszpeć, smolezione w trakcie dokonywania zmiany obsługi złotą obrączką i takim zegarek. Zwołano więc całą załogę przy krematorium obsługę Sonderkomanda i na jej oczach powieszono go za ręce z tyłu wędzane na specjalnej sztabie nad generatorami. W tej pozycji wisiał on około godziny po czym po rozwiązaniu rąk i znio-szone go do nieopalonego pieca w krematorium, gdzie pod spodem popielnika polano i zapalono benzynę tak, że płomienie dostawały się do retorty, w której znajdował się ów Lejb. Po paru minutach otworzono piec, skąd wówczas wybieł onikiem poparzony skazaniec, któremu kazano biegnąć naokoło podwórza krematoryjnego i krzyczeć, że jest słodziejem, a następnie kazano mu wapiąć się po drutach kolosastych ogrodzenia krematorium, które w tym czasie z wagi na porę dzienną nie były naciągane prądem elektrycznym. Gdy znalazł się on na exocyste drutów wtedy aser krematorium Moll zastrzelił go. Mollowi było na imię Otto. W innym wypadku SS-manni zapędzili więźnia odciągającego się w prpracy przy krematorium do dołu, w którym znajdował się wrzący tłuszcz ludski. Zwłoki palno wówczas w otwartych dołach, z których tłuszcz spływał do osobnego ziemnego zbiornika. Tłuszczu tego używano do polewania zwłok dla przyspieszenia procesu spalania. Niechcącyliwa tego wyciągnięto je zose ja sywego z owego basenu tłuszczu i zastrzelono.
Dla dopełnienia formalności zwłoki przewiesiono na blok, gdzie wystawiono "Totenschein", a dopiero dnia następnego przewieszono zwłoki na teren krematorium i spalono w dole. Sprężakogvredagvrvrv Pray wszystkich swłok, ponieważ w międzyczasie nadchodził transport grecki, który również zagazowano. Ponieważ jednak byliśmy przemęczeni i zupełnie wyosierpani, odstawiłono nas na blok, a prace przejęła inna zmiana. Sonderkomando, które obsługiwało wówczas również oba bunkry liczyło około 400 więźniów. Na krematorium II pracowałem gdzieś do połowy kwietnia. W tym czasie nadchodziły transporty greckie, francuskie, holenderskie. Ponadto paliliśmy w tym czasie swłoki ludzi, którzy poszli do gazu w wyniku selekcyj przeprowadzanych w obozie. Pracowaliśmy na dwie zmiany, dzienną i nocną. Cyfry zagazowanych i spalonych w tym okresie podać nie mogę. Przeciętnie spalano na 24 godzin około 2.500 swłok. W tym czasie nie miałem możliwości obserwować, jak odbywała się procedura wpędzenia ofiar do rozbierni, a następnie z rozbierni do komór gazowych. Gdy transporty nadchodziłyamykano nas z Sonderkomanda w koksowni. Dwóch pozostawiało jednak w koksowni do obsługi pieców generatorów. Zdarzyło się że i ja w tym czasie do obsługi takiej należałem. Przez okno koksowni obserwowałem jak odbywa się wypywanie "Cyklonu" do komory gazowej. Za każdym transportem jechało auto ze znakami Czerwonego Krzyża. Autem tym przyjeżdżał na teren krematorium lekarz obozowy Mengele wraz z Rottenführerem Scheinetsen. Wyjmowali oni z tego auta ze znakami Czerwonego Krzyża, którym przyjechali, puszkę "Cyklonu", zanosili je w pobliże kominków do wypywania "Cyklonu" do komory, tam Scheinetsen otwierał je specjalnym dłutem i młotkiem, wypywał zawartość puszek do komory i otwór zrywki sadykał przykrywą cementową. Kominków takich jak już wspomniałem, było osady. Do każdego z nich wypywał Scheinetsen zawartość jednej mniejszej puski "Cyklonu". Były to puszki oklejone szarym etykietą. Przed otwarciem puski Scheinetsen ubierał maskę gazową. Puskę "Cyklonu" otwierał w masce i w masce wysypywał zawartość puski do otworu prowadzącego do komory gazowej. Czynność tę wykonywali oprócz Scheinetsena także i inni SS-manni, specjalnie do tego przeznaczeni i należący do oddziału "Gesundheitswesen", których nazwisk jednak nie pamiętam. Przy każdym gazowaniu obecny był zawsze lekarz obozowy. Wymieniam Mengelego, poniewaz w czasie mej pracy jego bardzo często spotykalem. Oprócz niego wystawiali przy gazowaniu lekarze obozowi König, Tilo i jeszcze jeden azorupły, wysoki, młody którego nazwiska w tej chwili sobie nie przypominam. Był to ten, który w czasie selekcji wszystkich popytał do gasu. Przypominam sobie, że kiedyś Mengele wrócił się do Scheinetsa, by ofiarom znajdującym się w komorze gazowej dać prędszej śmierci, by mogły jechać wówczas do Katowic. Dosłownie wyraził się on wówczas "Scheinets, gib ihnen das Frassen, sie sollen direkt nach Kattowitz fahren". Oznaczało to, by Scheinets się spieszył z wypianiem "Cyklonu" do komory. Zauważyłem również w czasie pracy na krematorium II, że SS-manni eskortujący transporty nadobędzące na terytorium krematorium przesadzili ze sobą psy i mieli w rękach bykowsce. - - - - -

Woska do ładowania zwłok używano na krematorium II tylko przez krótki czas i zastąpiono go następnie żelaznymi noszami /po niemiecku nazywano je Leichenbrett/ które wsuwało się wgięb retorty na rolkach żelaznych montowanych na dolnym brzegu drzwic retorty. Zrobiono to dlatego, poniewaz używanie woska opóźniało ładowanie zwłok do pieca. To nowe urządzenie wynalazł zdaje się Obercamp August. Zastosowano je później przy wszystkich następnych krematoriach. Przy piecach krematorium II i III znajdowała się dla wszystkich trzech retort jednego pieca jedna para rolek, przesuwalna na żelaznej szynie przed drzwiczkami retort. W krematoriach IV i V każde retorta posiadała osobne rolki na stole przed jej drzwiczkami przygotowane. Każde krematorium posiadało dwoje noży żelaznych do ładowania zwłok do pieców. Deski te ustawiało się przed retortą. Dwóch więźniów kładło na nie zwłoki. Układano je w ten sposób, że pierwsze zwłoki kładziono nogami w kierunku retorty grzbietem w dół, twarzą do góry. Na zwłokach tych układano drugie również twarzą zwrócone ku górze, skierowane głową do retorty. Robiono to dlatego, by te górne zwłoki przyciskały nogi zwłok leżących na dole, i by zwłoki nogi zwłok leżących na górze nie musiały wypychać do pieca, lecz by wślizgały się one do pieca.

ładowaniem zwłok na nosze zajmowali się dwaj więźniowie. Dwaj inni stali przy drążku podłożonym pod nosze przy ich końcu, położonym bliżej retorty. W czasie układania zwłok na noszach jeden z nich otwierał drzwiczki retorty, a drugi składał rolki. Piąty więzień podnosił nosze za rączki i po podniesieniu ich przez dwóch poprzednich na drążku i ustawieniu na rolkach wypychał nosze do p. retorty. Gdy zwłoki znajdowały się już we wnętrzu retorty szósty więzień salazną grząką przytrzymywał je w głębi retorty a ów piąty wyściagał z pod nich nosze. Do obowiązków tego szóstego należało również polewanie wodą noszy po wyjęciu ich z pieca. Robił to dlatego, by ochłodzić nosze, które w piecu rozgrzewały się. Chodziło o to, by świeżo położone ciała nie przylepiały się do noszy. W wodzie tej rozpuszczano mydło, by zwłoki po blazie noszy dobrze się ślizgały. Drugi ładunek do tej samej retorty i dla tego samego palenia ładunek w taki sam sposób z tym jednak, że przy tej drugiej porze zwłok musieliśmy się bardzo spieszyć, ponieważ te wpierw załadowane zwłoki palili się już tymczasem, podnosiły się ich ręce i nogi. Tak, że przy opóźnieniu mieliśmy trudności z załadowaniem drugiej pory zwłok do pieca. Przy okazji ładowania tej drugiej pory zwłok do pieca miałem możność zaobserwowania przebiegu procesu palenia się zwłok. Wyglądało to tak, że zwłoki jakgdyby wyprostowywały się w głównym korpusie ciała, ręce podnosiły się do góry i przykurczały, te samo działo się z nogami. Na ciele tworzyły się pęcherze, a przy zwłokach starszych, które po zagniszeniu nieraz nawet do dwóch dni w pokoju zapasowym leżały i były napęczniałe i nabrzmiałe, pękały przepony brzuszne i wychodziły na wierzch wnętrzności. Proces spalania się zaobserwować również mogłem przy przegrzewaniu grząką w piecu dla przyspieszenia spalania się zwłok. Zresztą po każdym ładunku SS Kommandoführer kontrolował czy piec są należycie załadowane. My musieliśmy mu otwierać drzwiczki każdej retorty i przy tej okazji widzieliśmy co we wnętrzu jej się dzieje. Zwłoki dzieci paliliśmy wraz ze zwłokami osób starszych, dorosłych. Najpierw ładowaliśmy do pieca zwłoki dwójga ludzi dorosłych, a mniej tyle dzieci, wiele do retorty weszło. Naj-oszczędniej zwłoki 5 - 6 dzieci. Robiliśmy to tak dlatego, aby zwłoki dzieci nie leżały wprost na rusztach, które były szeroko rozstawione i zwłoki dzieci mogły przez nie przelecieć do popielnika. Zwłoki kobiet paliły się znacznie lepiej i szybciej, jak zwłoki mężczyzn. Dlatego też, jeżeli ludunek palił się źle, wyszukiwaliśmy zwłoki kobiety i wkładali je do pieca dla przyspieszenia procesu palenia. Przy pierwszych ludunkach gdy piec ogrzany był tylko generatorami palenie odbywało się powolniej. Później jednak w miarę spalania dalszych ludunków coraz bardziej rozszerzały się i zarem wytwarzanym przy spalaniu się zwłok tak, że przy spalaniu zwłok tłustych wogóle wyłączano generatory. Ze zwłok włożonych do tak rozszerzonego pieca sypały momentalnie tłuszcze do popielnika, w popielniku zapalał się i palił zwłoki. Przy spalaniu muzułmanów musiano stale palić w generatorach, Vorarbeiter zapisywał w notesie ilość zwłok palonych w każdym ludunku, a Kommandoführer SS-mann kontrolował te zapisy i po spalaniu całego transportu notes zabierał. Z każdą zmianą naszego Sonderkomanda przychodzili inni strażnicy SS i inni Kommandoführerzy. Z pośród Kommandoführerów przypominam sobie SS-mannów Gorgiessa, Knausa, Kirschmanna, Schultza, Kölna i Kellera. Również i ów Scheinets o którym już wspominałem, był przez jakiś czas Kommandoführerem w krematorium IV. Wszyscy Kommandoführerzy stękali się nad więźniami z Sonderkomanda, zatrudnionymi przy krematorium niemiłosiernie. Nigdy przybierało to takie formy, że na przykład szef krematorium Voss, który po pewnym czasie został ze stanowiska tego na inne przeniesiony zganił Kommandoführera Sigmunda Gorgiessa, który stękał się nad nami w sposób bestialski z tego tylko powodu, że w krematorium nie było pracy, ponieważ nie przybyły żadne transporty. Powiedział wówczas do niego "Wenn du hast nicht was zu unlegen, dann bist du wild. Ich habe das schon genug". O, różni wspomnianego Vossa, byli w różnych czasach szefami krematorium Unterscharführer Steinberg, Hauptscharführer Hirsch i Moll, Scharführer Fuch i przybyły z Lublina po zlikwidowaniu tamtejszego krematorium Oberscharführer Musfeld. - - - - -

- 21 -

- 23 -

Największym zwyrodniałcem wśród nich był Hauptsturmführer Otto Moll. Jeszcze przed moim przybyciem do obozu był on kierownikiem pracy na bunkrach, gdzie zagazowanych spalano w dołach. Później na jakiś czas przeniesiony został do innego oddziału. Szczęście wszystkich krematoriów powierzano mu w związku z przygotowaniami na przyjęcie masowych transportów węgierskich w roku 1944. Całą akcją masowego niania ludzi przybyłych tymi transportami, on przygotował. Jeszcze przed przybyciem transportów węgierskich, zorganizował wykopanie dołów obok krematorium V-go, oraz uruchomił ponownie nieczynny do tego czasu bunkier nr 2, i jego doły. Na podwórzu krematorium porozwieszał na słupach tablice z napisami, według treści których ludzie, przybyli transportami, mają przejść do obozu, gdzie czeka ich praca, że jednak muszą przedtem wykopać się i zostać poddani dezynfekcji. W tym celu muszą się rozebrać, a wszystkie rzeczy wartościowe złożyć w koszach specjalnie w tym celu na podwórzu rozstawionych. Treść tę powtarzał również osobiście w przemówieniach, z którymi wracał się do ludzi przybyłych transportami. Transporty te były bardzo liczne i zdarzało się, że komory krematorium V nie mogły pomieścić wszystkich przybyłych transportem. Tę resztę, nie mieszczącą się w komorach gazowych, rozstrzeliwał najczęściej osobiście. W wielu wypadkach, wrzucał ludzi żywcem do pionowych dołów. Ćwiczył się w strzelaniu na odległość do ludzi. Więźniów z Sonderkomanda maltretował i bił i traktował jak zwierzęta, przedzielone mu do jego osobistej obsługi więźniarki opowiadały, że ze skrzyni, w której pakowano grabione ludzi przybyłym transportami kosztowności, wydobywał przy pomocy drutu przedmioty złote i zabierał je w tajemce dla siebie. Z pogród rzeczy pozostałych po ludziach zagazowanych zabierał dla siebie futra i bardzo wiele środków żywnościowych zwłaszcza tkuszoną. Z udzieleniem wracał się w takich razach do SS-mannów otaczających go i mówił, że trzeba się zaopatrzyć w środki żywności, bo nadejdą również i chude dni. Po jego rozkazach Sonderkomando powiększone zostało do liczby około 1000 więźniów. Początkowo, gdy ja przydzielony zostałem do pracy w Sonderkomandzie, liczyło ono około 400 więźniów i w tej sile utrzymywało się do stycznia czy też lutego 1944 r. W jednym z tych miesięcy wysłano na transport do Lublina około 300 więźniów. W międzyczasie stale przydzielano do Sonderkomanda po około 50 więźniów tygodniowo, ginęło nas jednak tak wielu, że w początkowym okresie naszej pracy mimo tych tygodniowych przybytków, Sonderkomando nie liczyło więcej jak 400 więźniów. Po wysyłce naszego transportu do Lublina, pozostało nas około 100. Z Lublina przydzielono i przywieszono do naszej grupy 20 Rosjan i Niemca Karola, jako kapo. Ponadto przydzielono do Sonderkomanda jeszcze kilkudziesięciu więźniów, między nimi polskie aserów o palachy z krematorium I w Oświęcimiu. W miesiącu kwietniu 1944 r. liczyło zatem Sonderkomando około 180 więźniów. Pod koniec tego miesiąca w związku z transportami węgierskimi, powiększono je do 1000 więźniów. Postępowaniem swym i traktowaniem nas oraz rodzajem pracy przy masowym paleniu transportów węgierskich, doprowadził nas Moll i SS-manni z jego otoczenia do rozpacz. Po nawiązaniu kontaktu z obcymi i ze światem zewnętrznym, postanowiliśmy urządzić powstanie i albo przedrzeć się na wolność, albo zginąć. Termin powstania ustaliliśmy na czerwiec 1944 r. Doty dokładnej nie pamiętam. Powstanie nie doszło jednak do skutku a ponieważ było już do jego wybuchu wszystko przygotowane i w akcję tajemniczeni nawet tacy ludzie, przed którymi przytępowanie powstania trzymaliśmy w tajemnicy. Sprawa ta przyniosła nam duże szkody i po jej wykryciu podlegnęła ona całej dacie ofiary. Jako pierwszy rozstrzelany został w niedługi czas po terminie wyznaczonym na powstanie, nasz kapo Kamiński. Od tego czasu przeniesiono nas dla uniemożliwienia nam jakiegokolwiek kontaktu ze światem na krematorium IV. Z zakwaterowanej tam obsługi wysłano część i posłano do gazu około 200 więźniów. Zagazowani zostali w odwasalni na "Kanadzie" w Oświęcimiu, a spaleni w krematorium II, przy czym spalania dokonali sami SS-manni, zatrudnieni w krematorium. Sytuacja stawała się dla nas coraz cięższa i mimo, iż byliśmy ze zdwójoną oszczędnością straszeni i kontrolowani, postanowiliśmy za wszelką cenę uwolnić się z obozu. Po przygotowa-niach doszło we wrześniu 1944 r. do buntu w krematorium IV, który objął również krematorium II. W czasie buntu zabiliśmy na krematorium IV 25 - 30 SS-mannów i rozbiegliśmy się. Przedtem podpaliliśmy krematorium nr IV i wysadziliśmy je w powietrze. W obocie weszło alarm, SS otoczyło wszystkie krematoria, ujęło prawie wszystkich rozbiegających się więźniów. W wyniku powstania pozostało nas przy życiu z tysiąca tylko około 190-ciu. Wszystkich umieszczono na krematorium

- 23 -

- 34 -

III, a następnie przeniesiono na blok 11 odcinka B II d. Stamtąd 100 więźniów wysłano transportem, 30 odkomenderowano do polnia zwłok w krematorium V, a 60 mieszkano na bloku 11 i pracowano w Abbruchkommando. Komando to zajęte było rozbiórką krematoriów II i III, które przetransportowane miały być do Gross Rosen. Po jakimś czasie na bloku 11-tym umieszczono również i owych 30 palaczy z krematorium V, tak, że przy likwidowaniu obozu na bloku 11 znajdo-wało się około 90 więźniów z Sonderkommando. W dniu 18 stycznia 1945 wyprowadzeni zostaliśmy wraz z więźniami innych bloków do Oświęcim-nia i popędzeni w kierunku Rzeszy. Po przebyciu około 30 km, zbiegłem i w ten sposób uratowałem życie. - - - - -

Jak już poprzednio wspomniałem do Sonderkommando należeli również ostrej lekarze sekcijni. Początkowo mieszkali oni wraz z nami na bloku, a później umieszczono ich w pokoju obok koksowni w krematorium nr II. Lekarze ci przeprowadzili sekcję zwłok w pokoju położonym na parterze w krematoriach II i III. W pokojach tych znajdowały się duże stoły z masy kamiennej, na których dokonywali owi lekarze sekcji. Sekcjonowano zwłoki więźniów zmarłych w szpitalu, niektóre zwłoki osób rozstrzelanych w korytarzu między rozbiórnią a komorą gazową. Rozstrzeliwani takich dokonywał najczęściej Jan Moll osobid-cie. Rozstrzeliwano więźniów przywieszonych z bunkrów bloku 11 lub z posesi Jędrzejowa. Bardzo częste gdy przywieszono więźniów na rozstrzelanie, przyjeżdżał do krematorium Unterscharführer nieznane o mi nazwiska, który wycinał ze zwłok więźniów rozstrzelanych grube

mięso. Wycięte z okolicy ud oraz pośladków części ciała ludzkiego ladował on do skrzyni lub do wiadra i wywoził z krematorium autem. W jakim celu to robił, nie wiem. Z przeprowadzonej sekcji udzielił mi lekarz-rybnikowie protokołu sekcyjny. Protokoł ten zabierał następnie lekarz SS-mann.

W kwietniu roku 1943, było to w połowie miesiąca, przeniesiony zostałem do pracy w krematorium nr IV, które jako drugie z kolei zostało w tym czasie uruchomione. Następnie także w pierwszej połowie roku 1943 uruchomione zostało krematorium nr V, a w końcu krematorium nr III. Krematorium nr III sbudowane było tak samo jak krematorium nr II z tą różnicą, że w tym krematorium nie używano wogóle od początku wosku do ladowania zwłok do pieca. W tym pokoju obok koksowni w którym na krematorium nr II mieszkali lekarze, pracowali w krematorium III gold-arbeiterzy, którzy przetwarzali sztućce zębne w sztabki nielotne. Krematoria IV i V sbudowane były również według tych samych planów i ułożone symetrycznie po obu stronach drogi przebiegającej między obiektem B II i "Meksykiem" na kierunku nowej szlasy. Krematoria te posiadały po dwa piece ostereoretortowe. Retorty każdego pieca użytkowane były po dwie z każdej jego strony. Jeden generator opalał w tych piecach dwie retorty położone w jednej połowie każdego z pieców. Każdy piec posiadał własny komin. Zarówno rozbiernia jak i komory gazowe urządzone były w krematoriach IV i V nadziemnie. Budynek, w którym mieściły się one był znacznie niższy od hajoowni tak, że wyglądał na przybudówkę do krematorium. Z hajoownią sąsiadował w kierunku rozbierni wąski korytarz o czterech wewnętrznych drzwiach. Przewodziły one z każdego końca korytarza do hajoowni i do rozbierni. Rozbiernia posiadała ostere małe okienka zakratowane z od strony wewnętrznej kratami stalowymi. Dalesze drzwi wychodziły z rozbierni na korytarz, do którego znajdowały się drzwi wejściowe z podwórza krematorium. W tej samej ścianie co i drzwi wejściowe znajdowały się dwa okna. Nawprost od drzwi wejściowych do korytarza prowadziły drugie drzwi do wnętrza pokoju o jednym oknie, w którym mieściła się kuchnia dla SS-mannów.

- 26 -

zatrudnionych przy krematoriach. Potrawy przygotowywali w tej kuchni więźniowie z Sonderkomanda. Z pokoi tej kuchni do pokojów więźniów z Sonderkomanda. W krematorium V pracowali w tym pokoju kucharze i stolarze z Sonderkomanda, a na krematorium II natomiast zbudowano w tym pokoju wiszący obciążony zwłokami szereg szafek. Trzecie drzwi z owego korytarza prowadziły do mniejszego korytarza, który posiadał również drzwi do podwórza krematorium i jedno sakratowane okno. Z tego korytarza wszak wchodziło się drzwiami na prawo od wejścia do komory pierwszej, a drzwiami na lewo do mniejszej komory, z której prowadziły drzwi do komory ostatniej, największej. Zrównież ten drzwi i korytarz jak i trzy dalsze, wymienione ostatnio obok siebie, używane były jako komory gazowe do gaszenia ludzi. Wszystkie posiadały gazoszczelne drzwi, okna sakratowane od strony wewnętrznej i zewnętrznej na gazoszczelne okiennice. Przez okienka te, do których dostać mógł stojący na zewnętrznej budynku wązkożarna wydłużona ręką, obsługi do wypywania zawartości puszek "cyklonu" do zapalonych ludzi komór gazowych. Komory gazowe były około 2 m. wysokie, posiadały instalację oświetleniową elektryczną, prowadzącą po ścianach, nie posiadały natomiast instalacji wentylacyjnej. Zatrudnione przy wynoszeniu zwłok z komór gazowych Sonderkomando pracowali w maskach gazowych. Zwłoki ciągnięte po ziemi przez korytarz wejściowy, gdzie fryzjerzy obcinali włosy. Następnie przez rozbiornik, która służyła w tych krematoriach za pokój zapasowy zwłok. Była to duża hala, w której układano zwłoki aby ugrzać komory gazowe. Z rozbiornika przeciągano zwłoki przez drzwi w korytarz między halą wejściową i rozbiornik. Na każdym końcu tego korytarza stał dentysta, który wyrzywał zwłokom zęby złote. Ładowanie zwłok z hali wejściowej do retort odbywało się przy pomocy noszy żelaznych, które już poprzednio opisaliśmy. Za halą wejściową znajdował się pokój komendantów, obok niego mniejszy pokój dla reszty SS-ów, korytarzyk, umywalka i klozet dla SS-ów, oraz kuchnia. Cały budynek był murowany, posiadał dach o konstrukcji drewnianej, kryty płytami azbestowymi i papą. Podwórza wszystkich krematoriów oddzielone były od świata zewnętrznego gęstym plotem z wikliny i sygnietu, na których rozciągano jeszcze maty słomiane. Na podwórzu znajdowały się wieże strażnicze, w których ^{osuwali} SS-manni z karabinami i maszynami, cały teren był otoczony ponadto drutem kolczastym, naciągany prądem elektrycznym, podwórzą oświetlone były silnymi reflektorami. W maju 1944 r. SS-manni polecieli wykopać nam na podwórzu krematorium V-go w jego osłonięciu między rowem odpływowym, a budynkiem krematorium pięć dołów, w których następnie spalano zwłoki osób zagazowanych z masowych transportów węgierskich. Wprawdzie poprowadzono pomiędzy tymi dołami tor pod wózek, jednak wózka tego nie używaliśmy, SS-manni uważali je za niewygodne i więźniowie z Sonderkomando ciągnęli zwłoki zagazowanych z komór gazowych wprost do dołów. W tym samym czasie uruchomiono również drewny bunkier nr 2 i jego doły do spalania zwłok. Ja osobiście na bunkrze nr 2 nie pracowałem. Ponieważ doły uznano za lepiej nadające się do spalania zwłok, więc po rozpoczęciu palenia w dołach, unieruchomiano po kolei krematoria. Najpierw unieruchomiono krematorium nr IV, a więc się - czerwiec 1944 r. następnie szło się w październiku 1944 r. krematoria II i III. Krematorium nr V czynne było aż do ucieczki Niemców. Używano go ostatnio do palenia zwłok więźniów zmarłych, lub zabitych. Gazowania ludzi zaprzestano w październiku 1944 r. Dalej nie jestem w stanie podać ścisłej cyfry wszystkich osób, które zostały zagazowane i spalone w krematoriach i w dołach. Poszczególne ludzie z obsługi krematorium ukrycie notowali cyfry i drastyczniejsze zjawiska dotyczące się osób zagazowanych. Notatki te zostały zakopane w różnych miejscach obok krematoriów. Część z tych notatek odkopane w czasie pobytu Komisji sowieckiej, która je zabrała. Znaczna większość jednak powinna się jeszcze znajdować ukryta w ziemi, i można by ten materiał odszukać. Między innymi znajdują się tam zakopane zdjęcia osób zagazowanych w komorze gazowej, jak również transporty nadeszłe do krematorium do zagazowania. Według moich przypuszczeń ogólna cyfra osób zagazowanych w krematoriach oświęcimskich za czas w którym ja, jako osłonek Sonderkomando obsługiwałem te krematoria, były od światła zewnętrznego gęstym plotem z wikliny i synepiotu, na których rozciągano jeszcze maty słomiane. Na podwórzu znajdowały się wieże strażnicze, w których ^{osuwali} strażnicy SS-manni z karabinami w asynowym, cały teren był otoczony ponadto drutem kolczastym, naciągany prądem elektrycznym, podwórzą oświetlona była silnymi reflektorami. W maju 1944 r. SS-manni polecieli wykopać nam na podwórzu krematorium V-gó w jego części między rowem odpływowym, a budynkiem krematorium pięć dołów, w których następnie spalano zwłoki osób zagazowanych z masowych transportów węgierskich. Wprawdzie poprowadzono pomiędzy tymi dołami tor pod wóski, jednak wózka tego nie używaliśmy, SS-manni uważali je za niewygodne i więźniowie z Sonderkomanda ciągnęli zwłoki zagazowanych z komór gazowych wprost do dołów. W tym samym czasie uruchomiono również drewny bunkier nr 2 i jego doły do spalania zwłok. Ja osobiście na bunkrze nr 2 nie pracowałem. Ponieważ doły uznano za lepiej nadające się do spalania zwłok, więc po rozpoczęciu palenia w dołach, unieruchomiano po kolei krematoria. Najpierw unieruchomiono krematorium nr IV, a więc się - czerwiec 1944 r. następnie szła się w październiku 1944 r. krematoria II i III. Krematorium nr V czynne było aż do ucieczki Niemców. Używano go ostatnio do palenia zwłok więźniów zmarłych, lub zabitych. Gazowania ludzi zaprzestano w październiku 1944 r. Dzisiaj nie jestem w stanie podać ścisłej cyfry wszystkich osób, które zostały zagazowane i spalone w krematoriach i w dołach. Poszczególne ludzie z obsługi krematorium ukrycie notowali cyfry i drastyczniejsze zdjęcia dotyczące osób zagazowanych. Notatki te zostały zakopane w różnych miejscach obok krematoriów. Część z tych notatek odkopano w czasie pobytu Komisji sowieckiej, która je zabrała. Znana większość jednak powinna się jeszcze znajdować ukryta w ziemi, i można by ten materiał odzyskać. Między innymi znajdują się tam zakopane zdjęcia osób zagazowanych w komorze gazowej, jak również transporty nadeszłe do krematorium do zagazowania. Według moich przypuszczeń ogólna cyfra osób zagazowanych w krematoriach oświęcimskich za czas w którym ja, jako członek Sonderkomando obsługiwałem te krematoria, wynosi około 2 milionów ludzi. Podczas mojego pobytu w Oświęcimiu miałem możność rozmawiać z różnymi więźniami, którzy przetrwali przy krematoriach i bunkrach oświęcimskich przed moim tam przyjściem. I od nich to dowiedziałem się, że miało być zaopatrzenie obelugowe krematoria, zagazowane już około dwóch milionów ludzi w bunkrach nr I i II oraz w krematorium nr I. Łącznie więc ogólną liczbę zagazowanych ludzi w Oświęcimiu obliczam na około 4 miliony. Cyfra ta obejmuje różne transporty z najrozmaitszych krajów Europy zarówno żydów jak i aryjszych kół oraz osoby, które ze stamni obozowego zostały w drodze odbywanych selekcji przeznaczonych do zagazowania. - - - - -

Remontowanie krematoriów oświęcimskich rozpoczęło się w jesieni 1944 roku. Części remontowane odstawiane były na bocznice kolejową gdzie je salodowymano do podłączenia. Część remontowanego materiału krematoryjnego pozostała jeszcze w Oświęcimiu i znajduje się obecnie na placu budowy t. zw. "Bauleio" w Oświęcimiu I. Materiału tego Niemcy nie zdążyli już wywieźć. Jest to ów wózek o którym powyżej wspominałem, następnie części urządzenia wentylacyjnego, ramy od pieców krematoryjnych z krematorium IV i V, drzwi zewnętrzne od tychże krematoriów, popielniki, rusztowania, kraty okienne zewnętrzne, połączki do pieców, drzwi uszczelniające do komory gazowej, wieszaki i ławki z rozbieralni i inne części metalowe oraz z drewna. - - - - -

Na tym czynność i protokół niniejszy zakończono. Odczytano. - - - -

7-го декабря 1942 года я в числе 2500 человек, вначале
привезен был в лагерь Освенцим в отделение Вигенау.

Из 2.500 человек, по приезде в отделение Вигенау, молодых и здоровых мужчин 400 человек отобрали и направили в лагерь, а остальных в том числе всех женщин отправили для содержания в бараках.

Отбором людей для содержания занимался фашист-ОС МЕНГЕЛЬ /врач/ и ОС МОЛЬ, который руководил массовым содержанием людей прибывших из разных стран и разной национальности вна зависимости от пола и возраста.

ОС ПУГЕ в звании /наемного/ репортёра ведал темат людьми, которые отбирались для работы в лагере. МОЛЬ был в звании гауптшарфюрера.

8-го декабря 1942 года мне, как и другим заключенным лагеря, наколотли /татуировку/ номер 80359 на левой руке и поместили в барак № 14.

10-го декабря 1942 года ОС ПУГЕ и ОС МОЛЬ отобрали наиболее здоровых мужчин 200 человек и сказали, что отобранных посылают работать на резиновую фабрику, причем всех 200 человек ночью накормили жидким супом с бражкой, в виде дружеской нормы, с тем чтобы не вызвать у всех никое-либо сомнения в отправке на резиновую фабрику.

11-го декабря 1942 года, когда из 14 барака всех уведили на работу, старший барака по фамилии ПП /поляк/ объяснял, что все отобранные на работу на резиновую фабрику должны остаться в бараке. Затем пришел МОЛЬ и обращаясь к отобранным 200 чел. заключенным сказал, что бы все построились, так как пойдут ра-ботать на резиновую фабрику, причем отобранных МУЛЬ разделил на две группы. Каждую группу сопровождали 30 вооруженных ОС и 22 в ОС с собаками.

Оказалось, что всех обманули, ни на какую резиновую фабрику не сопровождали, а привели к 2-м газокамерам.

Меня в числе одной из 2-х групп привели в газокамеру, которая именовалась газокамера №2, а вторую группу повели в газокамеру №1.

Первоначально никто из 200 человек не знал, что нас ведут на работу к газокамерам. И все остальные об этом узнали, когда туда нас привели.

Из барака № 11 всех отобранных в сондеркоманду/специальную команду/ паравали в барак №2, который находился на расстоянии, приблизительно, 1 км. от газокамеры.

Барак № 2 был огорожен проволокой высотой до 1,5-2 метров.

На работу из барака и обратно в барак сондеркоманду сопровождали охрана ОС вооруженная автоматами. Никто из сондеркоманды не имел права и не мог общаться с другими заключенными лагеря, не работавшими в сондеркоманде, но несмотря на это некоторые ухитрялись и рискуя жизнью связывались с заключенными лагеря.

Группа приведенная на работу в газокамеру № 2 была распределена МУЛЬ на разные работы: 12 человек должны были из самой газокамеры разгружать трупы, в числе их был я. 30 человек - для погрузки трупов на вагонетки, 10 человек для подачи трупов к вагонеткам, 20 человек для забрасывания трупов во рвы, 22 человек для поджога дров в рвы для сжигания трупов, 2 - для извлечения у трупов золотых зубов, колец, серег и др., что делалось в присутствии двух ОС, и два для обривания волос у женщин, в присутствии одного ОС. Костры поджигал лично МОЛ.

Проработав один день в газокамере № 2, я заболел, в результате был переведен на работу по уборке и на другие работы в бараке № 2. При бараке я работал до мая 1943 года, а затем был переведен на работу по сбору кирпича от сортированных немцами полуподпольных помещений и каменных погребов. Здесь я работал до февраля 1944 года, одновременно работал в газокамере № 2, приблизительно два месяца. Несколько дней в газокамере № 1.

Газокамеры №1 и 2 находились одна от другой на расстоянии приблизительно 3-х километров, в районе бывшего населенного пункта Влозиши, сожженного немцами. Газокамеры были переоборудованы из 2-х домов, окна которых были герметизированы. В газокамере, именуемой газокамерой № 1, были два отделения, а в газокамере №2 - 4. На расстоянии приблизительно 500 метров от газокамеры № 1 были два деревянных стандартных барака, а на расстоянии 150 метров от газокамеры № 2 были также два барака. В этих бараках разделяли и гнали гнали в газокамеры-мужчин, женщин и детей, причем гнали всех вместе, гнали собаками. В каждом отделении газокамеры № 1 имелось две двери, в одну из которых загоняли голых людей, а на другой выносили трупы. На входной двери на наружной стороне была надпись: "Для дезинфекции", а на выходной двери, на внутренней стороне ее - "Вход в баню". Рядом с дверью, в которую вгоняли людей, имелся из 4-х угольный 40 x 40 см, через который высыпали во внутрь камеры циклон из коробки, содержащей синильную кислоту. В это время ОС-овец одевал противогаз. Высота банки 1 кг. Пустые банки ОС уносили.

В газокамеру / для отделения / загоняли по 1 500- 1 700 человек. Длительность газирования продолжалась 15-20 минут. Газокамера № 1 имела 80 кв метров. Циклон через лж в газокамеру таскали разные ОС, одного из которых фамилия ПАВЛИ. Разгрузкой камеры от трупов, как я выше указывал, занимались 12 человек попеременно, разгружали каждые 15 минут по шесть человек. Больше чем 15-20 минут в газокамере трудно было находиться, так как запах от циклона при открытии дверей сразу не улетучивался. Разгрузка камеры продолжалась 2-3 часа. Золотые зубы у трупов вырывали, а также снимались золотые кольца, серьги, брошки и др., а с ценники сбрасывали голоса. В карманах одежды трупов искали ценности, в частности золото. При срезании трупов присутствовал один ОС. На расстоянии 500 метров от газокамеры №1 находились четыре рва, где сжигали людей, каждый длиной 30-35 метров, шириной 7-8 метров и глубиной 2 метра. Трупы отвозили к яме на пяти платформах по узкоколейке. На каждую платформу укладывали по 25-30 трупов. Длительность одной транспортировки одной платформой в обе стороны продолжалась приблизительно 20 минут. У всех рвах работали посменно по 110 человек днем и ночью. За одни сутки во рвах сжигали по 7-8 тысяч человек. Газокамера №2 имела приблизительно 100 кв метров, каждое отделение / их было четыре / имело по две двери. В газокамеру № 2 помещалось 2 000 человек. Газирование продолжалось 15-20 минут. Циклон в каждое отделение газокамеры № 2 впускался так, как и в газокамере № 1. Разгрузка камеры продолжалась не более двух часов, так как она производилась из каждой двери, причем узкоколейная дорога проходила по обеим сторонам газокамеры №2 рядом с дверями, по этой дороге отвозили трупы во рвы на сжигание.

вагонетках. На расстоянии 130 метров от камеры № 2 находилось шесть рвов такой же величины, как и при камере № 1. На разгрузке камеры № 2 и сожжении трупов работало 110-120 человек. В течении суток во всех рвах при газокамере № 2 сжигали не менее 10 000 человек. В среднем во всех десяти рвах в течении суток сжигали по 17-18 тысяч человек, а в отдельных случаях число сожженных в течении суток составляло 27-28 тысяч человек, погибших из разных стран и разных национальностей, особенно евреев.

В феврале месяца 1944 года меня послали на работу в крематорий. Должен сказать, что каждый из "сондеркоманды" работал под страхом смерти, ибо ОС, сжигавшие трупы, были очень осторожны по отношению к тому сондеровцу, который выполнял любую-либо работу по газификации и сжиганию людей. Я и со мной еще четыре человека подавали /забрасывали / трупы в печь крематория. Трупы в печь подавались на железных носилках, которые устанавливались на рельсах. На носилку укладывалось по три трупа и по два трупа. В каждую печь забрасывали пять трупов. Трупы с железных носилок сбрасывались в печь при помощи специальных крючков, после чего носилки вытаскивались. На территории отделения Биржевую имелись и работали четыре крематория № 2, 3, 4 и 5, причем крематории № 2-3 были одним кофой конструкции и имели по 15 печей, крематории №4-5 также были одинаковой конструкции, но по размеру и техническим усовершенствованиям были менее удобны, и имели по 8 печей каждый. При каждом крематории имелся газокмера и одновременно работала газокмера № 2, трупы из которой подносили для сжигания ко рвам. Газокмера № 2 работала особенно тогда, когда прибывали по 6-7 вагонов с людьми, тогда не сжигали трупы на кострах, кроме крематорий.

Крематорий № 1 находился на территории лагеря "Аушвиц"-Освенцим. Как при газокмерах № 1-2, так и при газокмерах крематорий у трупов снимали: золотые зубы, снимали серьги, брошки и складывали в специальные ящики. В отделение Рикену прибывали вагоны с людьми, которых в последующем сжигали, из других лагерей прибывали в частности из лагеря "Майданек" в Варшаве. Русских людей почти всех сжигали, в последнее время до прихода частей Красной Армии и освобождения заключенных в лагере Освенцим, сжигали в основном только русских детей, отобранных от родителей, а взрослых использовали на работах в лагере. Особенно много детей согнали, прибывших с родителями из Литвы. В газокмерах газировали мужчин, женщин и детей одновременно. В течение суток сжигали по 10 000-12 000 человек во всех крематориях. Пепел от сгоревших трупов первоначально засыпали в специальные ямы, которые затем засыпались землей, а через определенный период /через сколько месяцев - не помню/ ямы откапывались, из них извлекался пепел и выбрасывался в реки. На территории ям, засыпанных с пеплом, строили шоссе, поэтому две ямы остались на раскопанных, по которым проходит шоссе.

№ 4 не работал в связи с поломкой дымохода.

При отделении Диркену среди зондеркоманды была группа, которая подготовляла бунт и сожжение крематория. Группой руководил один военнопленный полковник Красной Армии, имевший связь с майором и лейтенантом, находившимся в зондеркоманде. Звали полковника, майора и лейтенанта я не знал, зная военнопленного лейтенанта БУД-ТУР. Группа, подготовлявшая бунт, доставляла порох и делала примитивные гранаты. Порох доставляли через тех заключенных, которые работали при военных цехах, имевшихся при лагере.

В сентябре или августе 1944 года / точно не помню / начальство крематория не знало каким образом узнало о подготовке бунта, перевело всю зондеркоманду в самый крематорий № 4, где они пробыли один месяц. В первых числах октября 1944 года группа, готовившая бунт, подожгла крематорий № 4, убила несколько ОС-овцев и организовала побег. Среди убитых ОС-овцев был часовой, стоявший на вышке, в которую майор бросил гранату. В это время в зондеркоманде насчитывалось приблизительно 700 человек. Командование лагеря организовало задержание тех из зондеркоманды, которые успели бежать на небольшое расстояние, и всех поймали на полях неподалеку от крематория, причем человек 500 из зондеркоманды были расстреляны. Спустя приблизительно две недели после бунта и выхода из строя крематория № 4 были расстреляны еще 100 человек из зондеркоманды, а остальных распределяли в крематории № 2, № 3 и № 5.

Я был послан в крематорий № 2, где работал у одной из печей приблизительно 5-10 дней.

В мае, июне, июле и августе 1944 года одновременно сожжение трупов проводили во всех крематориях и во рвах на вострах, так как ежедневно было большое поступление ладей — по 5-7 вагонов. Все вагоны прибывали в эти месяцы из Венгрии. Одни крематории-печи не успевали сжигать ладей, газированных в газокамерах. При каждом крематории были склады, где складывались трупы, которые не успевали сжечь в день газирования. Во второй половине или в конце октября 1944 года, точно не помню, все газокамеры прекратили работать, а из действующих печей крематорий №2, 3 и 5 работал только крематорий № 5. Сжигали подвергали умерших, а в основном расстрелянных в лагере. Крематории отапливались коксом, а реж дровами.

Появляло, что состав Sonderkommando постоянно пополнялся вновь прибывшими ладей, тюмен тех, которых расстреливали или убивали в газокамерах, а затем сжигали.

Примерно в августе или сентябре 1944 года / точно не помню / 200 человек из Sonderkommando отвали пошлом в основной лагерь "Освенцим" и газировали ночью. В эту же ночь тех, кто остался в Sonderkommando, отправили в барак, а загазированных 200 человек сжгли сами SS-орды. Об этом мне стало известно спустя 2-3 недели после сжигания. В ноябре 1944 года стали разбирать все крематории. В основном из печей извлекали обтоды муфелей, которые куда-то увозили. Затем в стенах крематорий продавали цуры, куда выливали токсичные вещества, но этим способом взорвать крематории не удалось, поэтому стали применять какие-то другие способы и взорвали крематории №2 и 3, а № 5 взорвали за день-два перед отступлением.

18 января 1945 года меня в числе 100 человек из сондеркоманды эвакуировали из лагеря по направлению Германии, а 20 января 1945 года я бежал.

Появляю, что после бунта, организованного группой из сондеркоманды, ОС-омы подвергли поведению четырех девочек: заключенных лагеря за передачу ими взрывчатых веществ — пороха для тех, кто организовал бунт.

В числе расстрелянных 500 человек сондеркоманды был один еврей из города Луны ГРАДОВСКИЙ, который скрытно от ОС вел у себя учет прибывших эсалонов с ладами, которых ссылали.

Последние несколько месяцев до того, как сондеркоманда под огнем крематорий № 4, ГРАДОВСКИЙ, боясь, чтобы у него не обнаружили все записи, через других сондеркоманд стал закапывать / для сохранения / записи в земле. Мне лично ГРАДОВСКИЙ дал запрятать какие-то его записи, помещенные им в немецкую флягу, которую я закопал в землю, место это я могу показать. Это было в октябре или сентябре 1944 года. Мне также известно, где закопаны гранаты, которые изготовляли группы из сондеркоманды, подготавливавшие бунт и побег. Это место я могу указать.

ВОПРОС: Как были устроены газовые камеры при крематориях №2 и 3 и как в них происходило отравление ладей:

ОТВЕТ: При крематориях №2 и 3 при нацизм было по одной газовой камере, которые помещались в одном из подвальных помещений крематория и имели в длину приблизительно 30 метров. Второе подвальное помещение длиной 50 метров использовалось как раздевальня для ладей перед тем, как их немцы вводили в га-

Для забрасывания циклона в камеру на крыше последней имелись расположенные в шахматном порядке четыре квадратных отверстия, над которыми на крыше выступала ниша, до 30 см высоты, квадратная труба, накрытая слоем войлока и тяжелой бетонной с "амной крышкой. Под указанным отверстием в газовой камере были установлены фальшивые колонны на подбоях имевшихся там настоящих колонн. Эти фальшивые колонны были внутри пустые, а стены их были сделаны из листового железа с пробитыми отверстиями в виде облойной сетки, которой покрывались вентиляционные отверстия. В газовой камере имелись также фальшивые дуеты усть робота-дуетные распределители, которые служили для того, чтобы обмануть людей, попавших в газовую камеру, с целью, чтобы людям действительно казалось, что они будут там мяться. В газовой камере имелась приготовленная вентиляция. Входная дверь герметически закрывалась. Отопительные газовые камеры по мере надобности выносными конусами жарочными.

Отправление прибывших в крематорий людей происходило следующим образом: их раздевали голые люди набитыми очень плотно в камеру, так как на них направляли собак. Когда вся камера была плотно набита людьми, двери герметически закрывались и несколько минут вентиляторами откачивали из камеры воздух. Затем вентиляторы останавливались и ОС-отец открывал коробки с циклоном, выдвигал на крышу, сдвигал крышку люка, описанную выше, и засыпал через люк циклон в камеру. Примерно через 15 минут включали приточно-вытяжную вентиляцию, откачивали отравленный воздух, открывали двери.

ном количестве, трупы их после отравлений оставались в стоячем положении, так как им nowhere было упасть, т.е. трупы были плотно прижаты друг к другу.

ВОПРОС: Скажите, как были устроены газовые камеры при крематориях № 4 и 5 и как в них происходил процесс отравления людей.

ОТВЕТ: При крематориях № 4 и 5 была пристройка длиной приблизительно 20 метров. Внутри эта пристройка стенами была разделена на три отделения, каждое из которых было газовой камерой. Для забрасывания циклона в наружных стенах газовой камеры, на высоте около двух метров были устроены двери с решетками, закрывавшиеся герметически крышками. В каждой газовой камере имелось по две герметически закрывавшиеся двери. К помещению газовых камер через коридор примыкало помещение раздевальни, по площади равное помещению всех трех газовых камер, т.е. 20х12 метров. В зависимости от количества поступивших людей, их отравляли одновременно в двух, трех камерах. Процесс отравления людей происходил аналогично тому, как это делалось в газовых камерах крематорий № 2-3. Разница заключалась лишь только в том, что циклон забрасывался он через указанный выше люк, сделанный в стене, а не в крыше, как в крематориях № 2-3. Кроме того в газовых камерах крематорий № 4-5 не было вентиляции, поэтому проветривание камер производилось посредством открывания дверей и люков. Трупы после отравления из камер могли выгружаться в двух направлениях: их либо складывали в раздевальню либо как это делали некоторое время в крематории № 5 - выгружали через наружные двери во двор крематория, где сжигали на кострах. Когда раздевальня была заложена трупами и в это же время прибывали новые партия людей, то их раздевали по дворе крематория и затем обычным порядком отправляли в газовые камеры.

ВОПРОС: Известно ли Вам, когда прекратил работу крематорий № 1.

ВОПРОС: Сколько времени находились в эксплуатации каждый из крематорий № 2, 3, 4 и 5.

ОТВЕТ: Крематорий № 2 был пущен в марте 1943 года, как раз в день прибытия первого транспорта с людьми из Кракова / Польши / и находился в эксплуатации по октябрь 1944 года включительно, но, в ноябре 1944 года немцы приступили к разбору крематория. Крематорий № 3 был пущен в апреле 1943 года и находился в эксплуатации по октябрь 1944 года включительно, в ноябре же 1944 года приступили к его разбору.

Крематорий № 4 был пущен в конце марта 1943 года и находился в эксплуатации по август 1944 года включительно; часть его сгорела в начале октября 1944 года, в октябре же начата его разборка и закончена в ноябре 1944 года, точно не помню.

ВОПРОС: Сколько было обслуживающего персонала-рабочих из зондеркоманды в крематории, как была между ними распределена работа и сколько было смен.

ОТВЕТ: В каждом из крематорий № 2 и 3, работало в одну смену нормально до 10 человек рабочих из заключенных лагеря, входивших в зондеркоманду. Смена работала 12 часов. В сутках было две смены. Эти 10 человек рабочих, по крематориям № 2-3 распределялись на выполнение определенных работ следующим образом: 1. уборка пола, оставшихся в раздевалке, погрузка их на автоматы и уборка помещения	- 15 человек.

2. выгрузка трупов из камеры и подноска их к под"емнику	-15 человек.
3. укладка на под"емник	- 2 человека.
4. парикмахеры /стрижка женского волос с трупов /	- 4 человека.
5. зубодеры-дантисты /удаление золотых зубов у трупов /	- 2 человека.
6. для обслуживания генераторов	- 2 человека.
7. обслуживание под"емника для трупов	- 2 человека.
8. уборка трупов с под"емника	- 2 человека.
9. подноска трупов к муфелям	- 2 человека.
10. загрузка в муфеля, две группы по 5 человек	-10 человек.
11. помощники надсмотрщика	- 4 человека.

В крематориях №4-5 работало в смену по 30 человек. На все четыре крематория было кроме того три человека золотых дел, мастера, которые переплавляли золотые зубы, вырванные у трупов.

Больше показать ничего не имею, протокол с моих слов записан верно и мне прочитан в чем я расписываюсь. Подпись.

Допрос производился в присутствии переводчика бывшего заключенного лагеря Сельменгер доктор ШТЕЙНЕРТА, который предупрежден об ответственности за неправильный перевод. Перевод производился с польского на русский язык.

Oświęcim, dnia 10 i 11 maja 1945. sędzia Okręgowy Śledczy w Krakowie Jan Sehn, Członek Komisji dla Badania Zbrodni Niemiecko-Hitlerowskich w Oświęcimiu na wniosek i w obecności Członka tejże Komisji wiceprokuratora Sądu Okręgowego w Krakowie Edwarda Pechalskiego, oraz przy współudziale Bieglego Dra. Jana Zygmunta Hobla na zasadzie par. 254 w związku z art. 107, 109, 113, 124 Kodeksu Postępowania Karnego, przesłuchał w charakterze świadka byłego więźnia niemieckiego obozu koncentracyjnego w Oświęcimiu Nr. 80359, który zeznał co następuje: - - - - -

Nazywam się Szlama Dragon, urodzony 19. marca 1920 r. w Zerominie pow. sierpeckiego, syn Daniela i Małki Beckerman, / oboje nie żyją / kawaler, krawiec, religji mojżeszowej, narodowości polskiej i polskiej przynależności państwowej, zamieszkały przed aresztowaniem w Zerominie, ul. Biezuńska Nr. 16 / obecnie prawdopodobnie w Zerominie, Mławska 10 zamieszkał /. Do Oświęcimia przybyłem koleją w transporcie liczącym 2.500 żydów różnej płci i wieku z Ghetta w Miawie w dniu 7. grudnia 1942 r. Na stacji odebrali ten transport Lagerführer Plage, Rapportführer Palitsch i lekarz obozowy Mengele. Już na dworcu przeprowadzili oni selekcję, rozdzielając kobiety i dzieci do jednej grupy, a mężczyzn do drugiej. Z grupy mężczyzn wybrano 400 osób. W grupie tej i ja się znalazłem. Nas 400 odprawiono pieszo do obozu w Brzezince. Resztę t.j.m. wszystkie kobiety i dzieci oraz mężczyzn nie należących do naszej grupy wieszono autami w niewiadomym kierunku, w każdym razie poza obóz. Naszą grupę umieszczono na bloku 3-cim tego odcinka obozu, który później zamieniony został na obóz kobiecy. Kolejno przenoszono mnie później na blok 22, na starą * Saunę 2 i na blok 14 tego samego odcinka obozowego. W dniu 9 grudnia 1942 r. wieczorem przybył do bloku 14 Moli, Plage, Palitsch i Siwy oraz Arbeits-einsatz Mikus. Moli oświadczył, że dokona wyboru robotników do fabryki gumy. Każdy z nas podchodził do niego, Moll pytał go o zawód, przyglądał mu się, gdy był silny i zdrowy przeznaczając go do tej grupy, która według ich oświadczenia miała iść do pracy w fabryce gumy. Ja i mój brat podaliśmy, że jesteśmy zawodowymi krawcami i przeznaczeni zostaliśmy też do tej formowanej wówczas przez Molla i jego towarzyszy grupy. Rano dnia następnego t.j. w dniu 10 grudnia 1942 r. już po wyruszeniu wszystkich komando do pracy, przybył do bloku 14 Moll i zakomenderował "Sonderkommando raus". Z tego dowiedzieliśmy się, że należymy do jakiegoś "sonderkomanda", a nie do komanda przeznaczonego do fabryki gumy. Nie zdawaliśmy sobie sprawy co to jest owe "sonderkomando", ponieważ nikt nam tego nie wyjaśnił. Na rozkaz Molla wystąpiliśmy przed blok, gdzie otoczyli nas SS-mani i wyprowadzili poza obóz w dwóch grupach po 100 ludzi. Zaprowadzono nas do lasu, gdzie stała murowana chata, pokryta strzechą słomianą. Okna miała zamurowane. Na drzwiach prowadzących do wnętrza tego domu przybito była biała tabliczka z napisem "Hochspannung - Lebensgefahr". W odległości około 30 - 40 metrów od owego domu stały dwa baraki z drzewa. Po drugiej stronie domu znajdowały się 4 doły o wymiarach 30 m. długości, 1 m. szerokości i 3 m. głębokości. Brzegi tych dołów, były osmolone i opalone. Ustawiono nas przed domem, przybył Moll i oświadczył nam, że będziemy tu pracować przy paleniu ludzi starych i chorych, że my sami dostaniemy jeść, będziemy na noc odprowadzeni do lagru i musimy pracować, bo jak nie to ci, którzy nie będą chcieli pracować, będą bici i na takich jest kij i psy. Eskortujący nas SS-mani mieli rzeczywiście psy. Następnie rozdzielili nas na kilka grup. Ja sam przydzielony zostałem wraz z 11 innymi do tej grupy, która jak się później okazało - wyciągać miała zwłoki z owego domu. Wszystkich 12 ubrano nas w maski i podprowadzono pod drzwi domu. Moll otworzył te drzwi i wówczas dopiero zobaczyliśmy, że w domu tym leżą nagie zwłoki ludzi różnego wieku i różnej płci. Moll polecił nam wynosić te zwłoki z wnętrza domu na podwórze przed drzwi. Zaczęliśmy to robić w ten sposób, że jedne zwłoki wynosiliśmy we czterech. Zirytowało to Molla, zakasaliśmy rękawy i wyrzucaliśmy zwłoki przed drzwi na podwórze. Gdy mimo tej jego lekcji oświadczyliśmy, że my tak nie potrafimy robić, przydzielili nas do pracy po dwóch. Gdy zwłoki leżały już na podwórzu, dentysta któremu asystował So-Mann, wyrwał zęby, fryzjer - pilnowany przez SS-manna - strzygł włosy, a następnie druga grupa zabierała zwłoki na wózki /rollwagen/. Były te wózki umieszczone na wąskich szynach, które prowadziły na nad brzegi dołów. Szyny te przebiegały między dwoma dołami. Inna grupa zajęta była przygotowaniem dołu do spalenia zwłok. Na dnie układano najpierw grube drzewo, następnie coraz drobniejsze na krzysa, a w końcu suche gałęzie. Dalsza grupa odbierała zwłoki, przywieszane wózkami nad brzeg dołów i wrzucała je do dołów. Gdy już wszystkie zwłoki z domu do dołów przetransportowano, Moli polewał te zwłoki w 4-oh rogach dołu naftą, zapalał kauczukowy grzewiec i wrzucał go na miejsce polane naftą. wybuchał ogień i zwłoki paliły się. W czasie zapalania prze Molla my staliśmy przed domem i obserwowaliśmy to dokładnie. Po wyniesieniu wszystkich zwłok z domu, musieliśmy go dokładnie wyczyścić, zmywaliśmy podłogę wodą, posypywali ją następnie trocinami i białili ściany. Dom ów był wewnątrz podzielony ścianami poprzecznymi na 4 komory. Jedną, w której pomieścić można było rozebranych 1200 osób, w drugiej mieściło się 700, w trzeciej 400, a w czwartej 200 - 250 osób. Do pierwszej komory, tej największej, były w murze dwa okienka. Trzy dalsze miały po jednym okienku. Okienka te zamykane były na drzewiane drzwiczki. Do każdej komory prowadziło osobne wejście. Na drzwiach wejściowych wisiała tabliczka, o której już poprzednio wspominałem, z napisem "Hochspannung-Lebensgefahr". Napis ten widoczny był tylko wówczas, gdy drzwi wejściowe były zamknięte. Gdy drzwi były otwarte napisu tego widać nie było, a widać było natomiast napis drugi "Zum baden". Zagazowani znalazłszy się w komorze widzieli drugi napis umieszczony na drzwiach wyjściowych z komory. Był to napis "Zur Desinfektion". Za drzwiami, na których widniał ten napis ostatni, oczywiście żadnej dezynfekcji nie było, bo były to drzwi wyjściowe z komory, którymi wyciągaliśmy zwłoki na podwórze. Każda komora miała osobne drzwi wyjściowe. Opisaną przeze mnie komorę narysowałem dokładnie na podstawie moich sznań inż. Nosał z Oświęcimia. Komorę tę nazywano Bunkrem nr.2. Oprócz niej istniała bowiem w odległości około pół km. druga komora, oznaczona jako bunker nr.1. Był to również dom murowany, składał się jednak tylko z dwóch komór, które razem mieściły mniej aniżeli dwa tysiące rozebranych ludzi. Komory te miały tylko drzwi wejściowe i po jednym okienku. W pobliżu bunkra 1 stała stodołka i 2 baraki. Doły znajdowały się bardzo daleko i tu prowadziły do nich szyny pod wózki. - - - - - Wieczorem pierwszego dnia po ukończeniu pracy odprowadzeni zostaliśmy do obozu. Nie umieszczono nas jednak w bloku 14, z którego wyruszyliśmy do pracy, tylko w bloku nr.2. Na blok ten powróciła również druga grupa, która jak się okazało w dniu tym pracowała przy bunkrze nr.1. Był to blok zamknięty i otoczony, w odróżnieniu od innych bloków, murem. Nie wolno nam było komunikować się z więźniami z innego bloku. - - - - -

Do gazowania ludzi, nie wyruszało pełne komando. Odbywało się ono przeważnie w nocy. Wybierano wówczas z naszego komanda około 20 więźniów, którzy przy pracy tej pomagali. W zasadzie bowiem gazowanie przeprowadzali sami SS-Manni. Odbywało się to w ten sposób: ludzi dowożono pod baraki samochodami. My przydzieleni do pomocy, pomagaliśmy chorym zejść z samochodu i rozebrać się w baraku. Wszyscy przywiezieni rozbierali się bowiem w barakach. Baraki i przestrzeń między barakami a komorą otoczone były przez SS-Mannów z psami. Rozebrani ludzie szli nago z baraków do komory. SS-owcy, stojący przy drzwiach wejściowych, poganiali ich pałkami. Gdy komora była pełna ludzi, SS-owcy zamykali drzwi a Mengele polecał swojemu adiutantowi, Rotenführerowi Scheinmetzowi, rozpocząć gazowanie. Wyrażał się on "Scheinmetz mach das fertig". Scheinmetz wyjmował wówczas z auta czerwonego krzyża, które jechało za każdym transportem więźniów, przeznaczonych do zagazowania, puszkę gazu, młot i specjalny nóż, zakładał maskę, otwierał przy pomocy noża i młota puszkę, wsypywał jej zawartość przez okienko do komory. Następnie zamykał okienko, puszkę, młot, nóż i maskę odnosił do auta. A to te nazywali Niemcy między sobą "Banker". Sam wielokrotnie słyszałem, jak Mengele pytał adiutanta "ist der Banker da?". Po wykonaniu tych czynności, Mengele wraz z adiutantem odjeżdżali autem sanitarnym, a nas odprowadzano do bloku. - - - - -

Nie wiem jak było na początku, ale później po zakończeniu takiego gazowania nocnego, pozostawały przy bunkrze - a zwłaszcza przy barakach - straż SS. Zdarzało się bowiem, że gdy bunker taki pozostawiono do rana bez straży, wykradano akryzynie ze szłotami sebkami, które wraz z innymi rzeczami zagazowanych przechowywano w barakach. Zwłoki zagazowanych, leżały w bunkrze do rana, aż nadeszło komando, które dokonało ich spalania. Przebieg palenia był taki sam jak opisany przeze mnie w pierwszym dniu mej pracy przy bunkrze nr.2. Rzeczy pozostałe po zagazowanych w barakach zabierało następnego dnia specjalne komando, sortowało je i odwoziło do Effektenkammer w Oświęcimiu.. Doły opróżnialiśmy z popiołu przeważnie dopiero w około 48 godzin po spaleniu. W popiołach tych znajdowały się resztki kości, widać było ~~szlaki~~ czas-ki, kolana i kości długie. Łopatami wyrzucaliśmy popiół na brzeg dołu, sąjeżdżały auta, na które popioły ładowano i wywożono do Soły. Przy wyładowywaniu popiołu z aut przy Sole, byliśmy również zatrudnieni. Odbywało się to oczywiście pod kontrolą SS-Mannów. Przestrzeń między autem a wodą musieliśmy zaścielać plandekami tak, aby żadne resztki popiołu nie spadły na ziemię. Polecali nam SS-Manni tak wrzucać popiół do wody, aby z prądem popłynął dalej i nie osiadał na dnie. Powyładowaniu wozu, strzepywaliśmy proch z plandek do wody i całe miejsce wyładunku zamiataliśmy dokładnie miotłami. - - - - -

Zwłoki zagazowanych znajdowaliśmy po otwarciu komory przeważnie w pozycjach leżących. Gdy było dużo stłoczonych, leżały jedne na drugich wsparte jedne o drugie, niekiedy w pozycjach stojących z pochylonym tułowiem. W bardzo wielu wypadkach widziałem na ustach zagazowanych białą pianę. W komorze po jej otwarciu było bardzo gorąco i czuło się gaz, dusił on a w ustach było słodko, przyjemnie. Puszki gazowe były metalowe z naklejką koloru złotego. Takie same jakich później używano w krematorium. W obu bunkrach gazowano przede wszystkim ludzi przybyłych transportami z Polski a poza tym transporty Litwinów, Francuzów i Żydów z Berlina. Bunker nr.1, rozebrano całkowicie jeszcze w r.1943. Po wybudowaniu w Brzezince krematorium nazwanego nr.2, rozebrano również baraki przy bunkrze nr.2 i zasypano doły. Sam bunker pozostał jednak aż do końca i po dłuższej przerwie uruchomiony został ponownie do gazowania Żydów węgierskich. Wybudowano wówczas nowe baraki i odkopano doły. Pracowano wówczas przy tym bunkrze w dwie zmiany t.j. dzienną i nocną. Ja osobiście też tam pracowałem, sądzi się dwa dni. W tym czasie wydobywaliśmy zwłoki z komór bunkra w niedługi czas po zakończeniu gazowania i dlatego też zdarzało się, że gdy weszliśmy do komory słyszeliśmy jeszcze jęki, zwłaszcza wtedy, gdy złapał trupa za ręce i wyciągali z komory. W pewnym wypadku znaleźliśmy w komorze żywe dziecko. Zawinięte ono było całkowicie w poduszkę. Poduszkę zawinięta była i główka dziecka. Po rozwinięciu poduszki okazało się, że dziecko ma oczy otwarte i robi wrażenie żywego. Zanieśliśmy to dziecko wraz z poduszką Mollowi, meldując mu, że dziecko jest żywe. Moll zabrał nam je z rąk, zaniósł na brzeg dołu, położył na ziemi, stanął obcasem na szyjce a następnie rzucił do ognia. Widziałem na własne oczy całą tę scenę i zauważyłem, że w chwili gdy Moll stanął na szyji dziecka, ruszyło ono rękami. Dziecko to nie krzyczało przez cały czas, nie mogę stwierdzić bo tego nie badałem, czy ono oddychało, w każdym razie rzuciło nam się w oczy, że wygląda inaczej, aniżeli zwłoki nieżywych. Pojemność bunkrów nr.1 i nr.2, wynosiła około 4.000 ludzi. Bunker nr.2 pomieścić mógł jednocześnie we wszystkich swoich komorach ponad 2 tysiące, a bunker nr.1 mniej aniżeli 2 tysiące. - - - W roku 1943 przeniesieni zostaliśmy z obozu kobiecego do obozu B II d. i umieszczeni tam najpierw w bloku 13-tym, a następnie w bloku 11-tym. Jakoś w jesieni tego samego roku zatrudniono mnie ponownie w Sonderkommando. W przerwie między pracą przy bunkrach zatrudniony byłem w Abbruchkommando. Pracowałem przy krematorium nr.V. Aż do maja 1944, zatrudniano nas tam pracą w ogródkach, przy rąbaniu drzewa, zwożeniu koksu, ponieważ piece krematorium nr.V, nie były jeszcze wówczas czynne. Uruchomiono to krematorium dopiero w maju 1944, gdy nadchodzić zaczęły transporty Żydów węgierskich. Pracą w krematorium kierował Moll, wykonawcą jego rozkazów był Gorger kommandoführer, drugim kommandoführerem był Eckhardt, straż pełnili m.in. SS-Manni Kurzschius i Gutas. Krematorium to było tak samo zbudowane jak i krematorium IV. Oba te krematoria miały po obu stronach po 4 piece. Do każdego pieca wchodziły 3 trupy. Rozbieralnia i komory do gazowania /bunkry/ znajdowały się nad ziemią. Samo gazowanie odbywało się i w tych krematoriach w taki sam sposób, jak i w bunkrach nr.1 i 2. Ludzi dowożono do tych krematoriów autami a w ostatnich czasach, po uruchomieniu bocznic kolejowej do Brzezinki, pędzono ich także i do krematoriów IV i V z rampy kolejowej pieszo. Przybyli wchodziłi do rozbieralni, Gorger pędził ich mówiąc, róbcie to szybciej bo jedzenie i kawa wystygła. Ludzie żądali bowiem wody. Gorger odpowiadał im, że woda jest zimna, pić jej nie wolno, żeby pospieszyli się i gdy wyjdą z łaźni, dostaną herbatę, która jest dla nich przygotowana. Gdy już wszyscy znajdowali się w rozbieralni, Moll stawał na ławce i przemawiał do zgromadzonych. Mówił im, że przyszli do obozu, w którym zdrowi pójdą do pracy a chorzy i kobiety, pozostaną na blakach. Wskazywał przytem na zabudowania w Brzezince i mówił, że przed pójściem do obozu muszą się wszyscy wykapać, bo inaczej ich władze obozowe tam nie wpuszczą. Gdy już wszyscy rozebrali się, przepędzano ich nago do komory gazowej. Komór tych było najpierw 3, a w ostatnich czasach urządzono czwartą. Pierwsza miała pojemności 1500 osób, druga 800 osób, trzecia 600 osób a czwarta 150 osób. Z rozbieralni przechodzili ludzie do komór wąskim korytarzykiem. W komorach były napisy " Zur Desinfektion". Gdy komora była już pełna, zamykano drzwi. Robili to strażnicy SS, a najczęściej sam Moll. Następnie Mengele wydawał rozkaz Scheinmetzowi, który tak jak przy bunkrach szedł do samochodu ze znakiem czerwonego krzyża, wynmawiał puskę z gazem, otwierał ją i zawartość puszki wrzucał przez okienko ściany bocznej do komory. Okienko to było dość wysoko, tak, że dostawał się do niego po drabinie. I tu również jak i przy bunkrach robił to w masce. Po pewnym czasie Mengele komunikował, że ludzie już nie żyją, mówił "Es ist schon fertig" i wraz z Scheinmetzem odjeżdżał autem czerwonego krzyża. Moll otwierał wówczas drzwi komory gazowej, my ubieraliśmy się w maski i przeciągaliśmy zwłoki z poszczególnych komór, poprzez korytarzyk do rozbierni i przez rozbiernię i następny korytarzyk do pieców. W pierwszym korytarzu, znajdującym się przy drzwiach wejściowych, fryzjerzy strzygli głowy, w drugim korytarzu dentyści wyrwali zęby. Przed piecami układaliśmy zwłoki na żelaznych noszach, które następnie na rolkach, zamontowanych przy drzwiczkach od pieca, wsuwaliśmy do pieca. Na noszach układaliśmy zwłoki w ten sposób, że gdy pierwsze leżały głową do przodu, drugie układaliśmy głową ku tyłowi. Do każdego pieca wkładaliśmy po trzy ciała. Gdy wkładaliśmy trzecie zwłoki to te, najpierw do pieca wsunięte, już się paliły. Widziałem, że ręce takich zwłok podnosiły się, później podnosiły się nogi. Zresztą spieszyliśmy się bardzo i dokładnie całego przebiegu palenia nie mogłem zaobserwować. Spieszyć musieliśmy się dlatego, bo gdy kończyły tych palących się już zwłok na bardzo podnosiły się, mieliśmy trudności z włożeniem do pieca trzecich zwłok. Noszami posługiwaliśmy się w ten sposób, że dwóch więźniów podnosiło je ^{bardziej oddalonych od pieca,} a jeden z końca, z końca, który wsuwało się najpierw do pieca. Po wsunięciu noszy, jeden z więźniów, przytrzymywał zwłoki długim pogrzebaczem, nazywaliśmy to gracz, rozwidlonym na końcu, a dwaj inni wyciągali nosze z pod trupa. Po załadowaniu pieca zamykaliśmy drzwi i ładowaliśmy następny piec. Palenie trwało 15 - 20 minut. Po upływie tego czasu otwieraliśmy drzwi pieców i wsuwali do nich dalsze zwłoki. W tym czasie gdy nadchodziły transporty węgierskie, pracowaliśmy w krematorium V - tym na dwie zmiany. Zmiana dzienne od godz. 6.30 do 18.30 i zmiana nocna od 18.30 do 6.30 dnia następnego. Praca ta trwała około 3 miesięcy. Ponieważ jednak krematoria były mniej wydajne, wykopano dla palenia wygazowanych Węgrów, doły obok krematorium V. Były tam 3 większe i dwa mniejsze doły. Proces palenia w dołach obok krematorium V, był taki sam, jak w dołach obok bunkrów 1 i 2. I tu podpalaczem zwłok był Moll. Popiół z dołów wydobywano tak samo, jak to robiono w bunkrach, tłuczono w specjalnych tłuczkach na miazgę i wywożono do Soły. Popiół z pieca krematorium najpierw ~~zakopywano~~ zakopywano w specjalnie do tego celu kopanych rowach. Później jednak, było to z rozpoczęciem ofensywy rosyjskiej, Hoss polecił wydobyć popiół krematoryjny z tych dołów i rów-

 Komory krematorium nr.5 używane do gazowania były na około 2 i 1/2 m. wysokie. W każdym razie wyciągniętą do góry ręką do sufitu dostać nie mogłem. Od górnej części drzwi do sufitu było jeszcze około 70 cm. Dolny brzeg otworu okiennego, przez który wsypywano do komory zawartość puszek Cyklonu, mógł dorosły mężczyzna średniego wzrostu wyciągniętą do góry ręką dosięgnąć. Scheinmetz miał jednak specjalną drabinę, na której stawał, gdy Cyklon do komory wsypywał. Czynność tę wykonywali w różnych okresach czasu także inni SS-Manni, których nazwisk jednak nie znam. Nazwisko Scheinmetza znam dlatego, ponieważ był on początkowo kommandoführerem naszego Sonderkommando. Imienia jego nie znam. Jest to mężczyzna średniego wzrostu, niższy ode mnie, blondyn, sądzę że miał około 26 lat. Do obsługi przyjmował zawsze dziewczęta ze Słowacji. Czy rozmawiał z nimi po słowacku, czy też po niemiecku nie wiem. Szefem krematoriów IV i V oraz bunkra nr.2, był Hauptscharführer Moll. Był to mężczyzna średniego wzrostu, tegiej budowy ciała, blondyn, uczesany na przedział. Miał lewe sztuczne oko. Sądzę, iż liczył on około 37 lat. Żona jego wraz z dwójkiem dzieci /synek około 10 lat, córka młodsza około 7 lat/ mieszkała w Oświęcimiu. Przy gazowaniu ludzi asystował najczęściej lagerarzt Mangele. Był to mężczyzna mojego wzrostu, przypuszczam że miał około 40 lat, szatyn. Przyjeżdżał on stale autem sanitarnym, którym przywożono Cyklon i zarówno ja jak i inni więźniowie zatrudnieni w Sonderkommando, widzieliśmy, że w czasie gazowania ludzi stał on przy drzwiach pro-wadzących do komory gazowej. Drzwi te zaopatrzone były w okienko. Po ukończeniu gazowania, otwierano komorę gazową na rozkaz Mengelego. Przy wydobywaniu zagazowanych z komory, Mengelego już nie było, odjeżdżał on bowiem zaraz po stwierdzeniu, że ofiary są już zagazowane i wydaniu rozkazu do otwarcia drzwi komory gazowej. Odjeżdżał tym samym autem sanitarnym. Nie widziałem nigdy, by Mengele badał ludzi idących do komory gazowej, lub by oglądał lub badał zwłoki zagazowanych. - - - - -

 Z początkiem maja 1944 zaczęto gazować i palić w krematorium V. transporty Żydów węgierskich. Zwłoki zagazowanych z kilku pierwszych transportów spalono w piecach krematorium IV, ponieważ w tym czasie zepsute były kominy w krematorium V-tym. Żydów węgierskich palono do końca w dołach, wykopanych w tym celu obok budynku krematorium nr.V. Wykopano tam 5 dołów 25 m. długich, 6 m. szerokich i około 3 m. głębokich. W dołach spalano dziennie około 5000 osób. Ponieważ jednak transportami nadchodziło więcej Żydów węgierskich, więc uruchomiono ponownie bunker nr.2 i tam również gazowano i palono ludzi. Wiele osób palono dziennie w tym bunkrze, nie wiem, ponieważ w tym czasie, gdy palono tam Żydów węgierskich, ja przy bunkrze nr.2. nie pracowałem. Zarówno Sonderkommando zatrudnione przy krematorium V-tym, jak i Sonderkommando pracujące przy bunkrze nr. 2. pracowało w dwóch zmianach: dziennej i nocej. Praca taka trwała przez miesiąc maj i czerwiec 1944. Ja obliczam, opierając się na moich spostrzeżeniach, że w krematorium nr. V spalono w tych dwóch miesiącach około 300 tysięcy Żydów węgierskich. Ludzi tych przypędzano do krematorium V-go pieszo, wprost z rampy wyładowniczej w Brzezince. Byli wśród nich mężczyźni, kobiety i dzieci różnego wieku. Gdy taki transport nadchodził na teren krematorium, nas zamykano w dwu małych pokojkach specjalnie na ten cel przeznaczonych. Chodziło o to, abyśmy z ludźmi tymi nie rozmawiali i ~~na~~ nie zdradzili im, jaki los ich czeka. Zdarzało się jednak, iż po drodze ktoś z transportu zasłabł. Pod eskortą SS-Manna musieliśmy donieść takiego na teren krematorium. W takich sytuacjach rozmawialiśmy nieraz z niesionymi przez nas chorymi. Większość z nich nie wiedziała, że idzie na śmierć, a gdy mówiliśmy im, że idą do krematorium, nie wierzyli temu. Przypominam sobie, że w roku 1943 spalono w krematoriach II -V, 70.000 Żydów greckich. Cyfrę tę pamiętam dlatego, że komandoführer krematoriów II i III Keler groził nam przednadejściem tych transportów, mówiąc że dobre czasy skończyły się już dla nas, bo nadejdzie w niedługim czasie transport z Grecji, liczący 70 tysięcy ludzi. Mówił on do nas tak dlatego, bo właśnie przed gazowaniem tych ludzi z transportów greckich, była przerwa w pracy krematoriów i nie pracowaliśmy ciężko. Co do innych narodowości, nie posiadam żadnych cyfr i nie potrafię stwierdzić, wiele przypada na poszczególne kraje i narody z ofiar zagazowanych w krematoriach obozu oświęcimskiego. Ja obliczam liczbę zagazowanych w obu bunkrach i w czterech krematoriach na przeszło 4 miliony. Tego samego sadnia byli i inni więźniowie zatrudnieni w Sonderkommando. Schreiber naszego kommando Sauman Gradowski, rodem z Grodna, robił zapiski, w których notował na podstawie informacji udzielanych przez więźniów pracujących przy wszystkich krematoriach, ilość ludzi zagazowanych i spalonych w poszczególnych krematoriach oraz wszystkie przeżycia więźniów z Sonderkommando. Gradowski został zastrzelony w październiku 1944 w czasie powstania. Zastrzelono wówczas 500 więźniów z Sonderkommando, które liczyło w tym czasie 700 więźniów. 100 z nich spało w krematorium nr. II, dalszych 100 w krematorium nr. III, a 500 w krematorium nr. IV. Pamiętniki owego Gradowskiego, które zakopane były na terytorium odgrodzonym drutem kolczastym dla krematorium nr. II odkopałem i wręczyłem komisji sowieckiej. Był to notatnik i list adresowany do nieznanego znalazcy. Na zlecenie komisji sowieckiej wszystkie znalezione pisma, które pisane były w języku hebrajskim, przetłumaczył na język rosyjski więzień lekarz dr. Gordon. Komisja sowiecka materiały te ze sobą zabrała. Wiem, iż na terytorium należącem do krematorium nr. II, zakopane są jeszcze inne dokumenty i zapiski oraz przysypane ziemią doły z popiołem ze zwłok ludzkich spalonych w tym krematorium. Rzeczy tych szukać należy naprzeciw praców krematoryjnych. Miejsca wskazać dokładnie nie mogę, ponieważ po zburzeniu krematorium sytuacja się tam zmieniła, teren został jeszcze za czasów niemieckich wyrównany, tak że straciłem orientację. Przy gazowaniu i paleniu ludzi w krematoriach nr. II i III nie pracowałem. Zatrudnieni tam byli Zisner i Mandelbaum. Tauber pracował wraz ze mną a ponadto przed przeniesieniem go do krematoriów w Brzezince, w krematorium nr. I w Oświęcimiu. - - - - -

W Sonderkommandzie, które obsługiwało oba bunkry przed przydzieleniem mnie do nowoutworzonego Sonderkommando w grudniu 1942, pracowali w większości Słowacy. Wszyscy z tego Sonderkommando zostali zagazowani w krematorium nr. I w Oświęcimiu. Jak już poprzednio wspomniałem, Sonderkommando do którego ja zostałem przydzielony, składało się z 200 więźniów. W niedługim czasie wzmocniono je do czterystu. Następnie wysłano 200 więźniów z tego Sonder-kommando do Lublina, skąd przyszło do Sonderkommando 20 Rosjan. Od Rosjan tych dowiedzieliśmy się, że tych 200 wysłanych do Lublina tam rozstrzelano. W 1943 r. przydzielono do naszego Sonderkommando 200 Greków, a w roku 1944, 500 Węgrów. W październiku 1944 r. zastrzelono 500 więźniów, w szczególności 400 na podwórzu krematorium nr. IV a 100 na polu obok krematorium nr. II. W tym samym miesiącu wybrał Moll około 200 więźniów z Sonderkommando, którzy odprowadzeni zostali do Oświęcimia i jak nas później poinformowali więźniowie zatrudnieni w Kanadzie, zagazowani w komorze służącej zasadniczo do gazowania rzeczy magazynowanych w Kanadzie. W listopadzie 1944 r. ~~wyma~~ wysłano 100 więźniów z Sonderkommando do Gross Rosen. Tak nam przynajmniej mówiono. W każdym razie wyjechali oni transportem karnym. Po tych wszystkich ubytkach pozostało nas w Sonderkommando ponad 100 więźniów. Krematorium nr. V czynne było aż do ostatnich dni pobytu Niemców w obozie i wysadzone zostało przez nich w powietrze dynamitem tuż przed ich ucieczką. Było to w dniu 20 stycznia 1945. Ostatnio palono w tym krematorium tylko zmarłych lub zabitych w obozie. Gazowania ludzi już nie przeprowadzano. Krematorium obsługiwało w tym czasie 30 więźniów z Sonderkommando, a reszta zatrudniona była przy rozbiórce krematoriów II i III. Ja pracowałem przy rozbiórce. - - - - -

Z końcem maja 1944 przeniesiony zostałem wraz z całym Sonderkommandem z bloku II odcinka B II d do krematorium nr. IV, gdzie mieszkaliśmy aż do października 1944 r. Jak już poprzednio wspominałem w październiku 1944 r. mieszkaliśmy w tym krematorium około 700 więźniów z Sonderkommando. Ponieważ krematoria w tym czasie nie potrzebowały już do obsługi tyle ludzi, przeto obawialiśmy się, że zostaniemy sami zagazowani i dlatego też postanowiliśmy urządzić powstanie. Planowaliśmy je już od dawna, mieliśmy kontakt i łączników ze światem wyrabialiśmy granaty, mieliśmy broń i aparat fotograficzny i czekaliśmy na rozpoczęcie trzeciej ofensywy sowieckiej. Sądziliśmy bowiem, że tylko w razie ofensywy akcja nasza może mieć widoki powodzenia. W październiku sytuacja nasza wydała nam się być groźną i dlatego też, postanowiliśmy nie zwlekać, tylko przystąpiliśmy do akcji. Daty dokładnie nie pamiętam, było to w sobotę, kiedy rzuciliśmy się na strażę SS, 12 SS-Mannów zostało rannych. Podobno byli wśród nich i zabici. O tym samym czasie przeprowadzili akcję więźniowie Sonderkommando zakwaterowani w krematorium II. W krematorium nr. III Sonderkommando ~~mieszkały~~ nie zdarzyło rozpocząć akcji. Na teren naszego krematorium nadciągnęły zaraz posiłki SS, parę kompanji obstawiło cały teren, zastrzelono około 500 więźniów a reszta, ukrywając się, zdołała uratować życie. Ja ukryłem się pod sągiem drzewa a Tauber w ciągach komina krematorium nr.V. Wszystkich, nas pozostałych przy życiu, przeniesiono i zakwaterowano w krematorium nr.III. Utrzymano nas przy życiu, gdyż w tym czasie prowadzono dochodzenia dla wykrycia całej naszej organizacji. Nie udało się to jednak mimo bardzo częstych rewizji osobistych i na kwaterze, ponieważ po upadku powstania wszystkie materiały a zwłaszcza granaty zakopaliśmy i saniechaliśmy akcji konspiracyjnej. W krematorium nr.III mieszkaliśmy do listopada 1944 r. Następnie przeniesiono całe Sonderkommando do obozu B II d. Ja znalazłem się w bloku 13. Od października 1944, a więc od czasu opisanego przeze mnie powstania, pracowałem przy rozbiórce krematoriów, w szczególności przy rozbiorze krematorium nr.IV. Zostało ono spalone w czasie powstania, tak że rozbieraliśmy tylko mury. Części żelazne pieców tego krematorium odtransportowane zostały do Oświęcimia, gdzie leżą dotąd na Bauhofie. Inni więźniowie z Sonderkommanda zatrudnieni byli w tym samym czasie przy rozbiórce krematoriów nr.II i III. Krematoria te zaczęto rozbierać w listopadzie 1944 r. i jak nam mówiono, miały one być przeniesione do Gross Rosen. Części żelazne pieców tych krematoriów oraz drzwi, urządzenia wentylacyjne, ławy, schody i inne części znajdują się dotąd na Bauhofie. - - - - - Zaznacza, że w bunkrach nr.1 i nr.2. oraz w krematoriach nr.IV i V były zastosowane drzwi i klapy okienne tego samego typu. Były one sporządzone z grubego drzewa, ciężkie, felsewane i we fugach wyłożone filcem uszczelniającym. Drzwi zamykało się na podwójne, duże, żelazne klamki, które dla uszczelnienia przykręcało się śrubami. Drzwi bunkrów nie miały okienek wziernikowych. Drzwi prowadzące do komór gazowych we wszystkich krematoriach /II -IV / wyposażone były w takie okienka. Krematoria nr. II i III nie miały drewnianych okiennic, ponieważ do komór gazowych tych krematoriów wrzucano Cyklon otworami znajdującymi się w powalach. Otwory te zatykane były płytami betonowymi. - - - - - Przedkładam schematyczne szkice bunkrów nr.1 i 2, oraz krematorium nr.V. Krematorium nr.IV było ~~identyczne~~ identycznie zbudowane i usytuowane symetrycznie do krematorium nr.V. Proszę o załączenie przedłożonych szkiców do niniejszego protokołu dla wyjaśnienia i należytego zrozumienia treści moich zeznań. - - - -

 Na bloku 13 -tym obozu B II d, przebywałem do początku stycznia 1945 r. Następnie przeniesiony zostałem wraz z całym Sonderkommandem na blok 16-ty, skąd 18 stycznia wysłany zostałem transportem w kierunku Rzeszy. Szliśmy pieszo i w okolicy Paszyny udało mi się wraz z Tauberem uciec z transportu. Wraz ze mną wyszło z Oświęcimia całe Sonderkommando t.zn. ponad 100 ludzi. Którzy z nich pozostali przy życiu - nie wiem. W ostatnich dniach powrócił Mosiek Van Kleib, Holender, ~~który~~ który nie zatrzymując się wyjechał do swoich ojczyzny. Wśród więźniów Sonderkommanda, którzy wyszli z Oświęcimia, znajdowali się między innymi Zaweł Chrzan z Gostynina, Samuel -Francuz, Leibel z Grodna, Lesko z Czerwonego Boru, Dawid Nencel z Rypina, Moszek i Jankel Weingarten z Polski, Sender z Berlina, Moryc z Grecji, Abraham Dragon z Żeromina, Serge- Francuz / blokÄltester/, Abo z Grodna, Becker Berek z Łuny, Kuzyn z Radomia, i in., ~~których~~ których nazwisk nie pamiętam. - - - - - Ja zamierzam obecnie osiąść w Żerominie i rozpocząć pracę w tym zawodzie. Przypuszczam, że powróci także i mój brat i będziemy razem pracować. Spodziewam się, że powołany zostaną do wojska. Po przejściach w obozie jestem nerwowo wyczerpany zupełnie, chcę koniecznie powrócić do normalnego życia, wyjść z atmosfery obozowej i zapomnieć o tym wszystkim, co w Oświęcimiu ~~przeżyłem~~ przeżyłem. - - - - -

Foreword

As I write this, I am 57 years old. If someone asked me to recall events of my youth when I was 16, 18, 20 or 22 years old, I would be able only to make general statements about where I was and what I was doing. A few events that were important to me I probably could describe in more detail, but without being able to say exactly during which year they occurred, let alone the month or even day. Describing locations, buildings, facilities and devices I saw, visited and/or used during those years would be very sketchy at best.

There is nothing unusual about this. Human memory is very imperfect to begin with, and unless it gets refreshed frequently, it steadily deteriorates to the point where, after decades, little of it is left.

Stop.

There is no such thing as “refreshing” a memory. Any information lost in our brain is gone. Period. If you “refresh” your memory by revisiting places you have seen before, or by taking in documents and recordings about the events you experienced, you are not refreshing your memory. You are replacing it with new information. But this new information is by no means a perfect match to what you once thought you experienced and remembered. This is so mainly for two reasons:

1. What we remember at the time of an event is rarely, if ever, accurate information about our sensory inputs (which in itself is very incomplete and fallible). All creatures, humans included, extrapolate and interpolate the information we perceive. We are very good at (often subconsciously) adding “information” to the data we perceive in an attempt to fill discontinuities, or to make sense of things about which we don’t know enough to comprehend them fully. We are moreover pattern-recognition machines prone to seeing things where there sometimes are none, to spot relationships, correlations and causations where there may not be any.

2. New information we receive later can never be a 100% match with what we experienced, because obviously it was not recorded by our brains, but by someone else's, or maybe even by some other device altogether, certainly from a different perspective, and maybe even at a different time. And that is the best scenario. It could also be that the new information isn't information at all, but to one degree or another disinformation, containing data that has no eventual connection to what we experienced, representing instead some other event, or it may even have nothing to do at all with what really happened, because it is to some degree or another made-up, fake data.

For those reasons, “refreshing” a memory is never what it is purported to be. It is inevitably a rewriting of memory, a conflation of whatever is left of our actual memory with what we perceive later. When this happens, we are all at the mercy of the accuracy of what we learn later.

There is no topic in the world where memory-distorting forces are stronger than the Holocaust. The reasons for this are manifold:

- The Second World War was the cruelest war ever fought in the history of mankind. Truth is always the first casualty of any war, but in this war in particular, atrocity propaganda directed against the enemy was invented and spread systematically by all sides. It is impossible for this propaganda not to have had an impact on the people involved in it, in particular those imprisoned in camps, where access to any information source was extremely limited, if not completely absent. As a result of such a situation, the data-starved human brain goes into extrapolation overdrive. The outcome of this is that war-time camps are known to have been massive rumor mills. Carlo Mattogno has written two monographs documenting the effects of wartime propaganda on false rumors spread concerning Auschwitz, and regurgitated by numerous camp inmates (Mattogno 2018, 2021).
- The whole world is currently horrified by the crude and outrageously nonsensical propaganda dished out by Russian government media about the war in Ukraine. Few realize that this is a mere repetition of what was going on between 1941 and 1945 during the war between Germany and the Soviet Union. Only back then, many of the rest of the world's governments were allied with Soviet Russia and tacitly or even openly agreed to support and repeat this propaganda. While the current Russian propaganda will not survive this war, no matter who wins it (if there will be any winners, that is), Soviet-Russian and Allied propaganda of WWII was imposed as “the truth” after Germany's total defeat and collapse.
- Even before the end of the war, a number of Allied nations started war-crimes trials against individual Germans and their collaborators. Many more of them were initiated after the German capitulation, culminating in the Nuremberg Trials. Conducted in the overheated atmosphere of mass-murderous hatred and frenzied wartime propaganda, these trials were thinly veiled show trials. Witnesses unwilling to confirm the Allied narrative had to face a multitude of repercussions, starting from denial of food rations and shelter to threats of deportation to Siberia, maltreatment, torture and criminal prosecution. There was no incentive to tell anything different than what the Allied prosecutors had already determined beforehand to be “the truth.”

- Although even high officials, such as then Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court Harlan Fiske Stone, pronounced the Nuremberg Tribunals to be nothing more than “high-grade lynching parties,” these are held in high regard to this day by mainstream historians as a role model for all later international justice organizations. Hence, it cannot surprise that these tribunals’ findings have a significant impact on what people consider to be true. Many witnesses who testified subsequently will have willingly adjusted their own recollections to fit the narrative seemingly demonstrated to be “true” by these highest and most reputable of all legal authorities on the planet.
- No event of world history has been covered more intensely by all sectors of all Western and former East-Bloc societies than “the Holocaust.” The amount of books printed, movies produced, documentaries aired, media articles published is simply staggering. No other event has supported the formation of more organizations and institutions dealing with this event: Museums, Memorials, associations of former deportees, research departments at colleges and universities. No historical event is taught and preached about more thoroughly and more often than this one, in schools and colleges, by politicians and historians, by teachers and journalists. Every year of this incessant barrage of supportive repetition of wartime propaganda themes inevitably leads to every witness’s memory getting increasingly overwritten, in particular those individuals who are actively involved in survivor organizations, as witnesses in court proceedings, media events and public appearances.
- Anyone who publicly dares diverge to any noticeable degree from the narrative expected by the general public experiences social ostracism, societal persecution and in more-recent decades even criminal prosecution in many countries. This includes any witness of the events. There is not only no incentive to tell any story not in line with the orthodox narrative, there are actually massive threats looming over anyone daring to disagree.

In summary, there is no historical event where the memory of any witness has been subjected to more post-event rewriting, reshaping and replacement than the Holocaust. As Carlo Mattogno has shown in the previous two studies of this trilogy, not even testimonies recorded within months or at most a few years after the events can be trusted to accurately reflect what could possibly have happened. Therefore, testimonies of later years and decades are bound to reflect not real memories that survived the ravages of human forgetfulness, but rather mere echoes and reflection of the absolutely dominant orthodox narrative, and increasingly so as the temporal distance grows.

To put it succinctly, from a historiographic point of view, late testimonies on the Holocaust recorded many decades after the witnessed or claimed events are worthless.

So why write and publish a study such as the present one in the first place? There are two reasons for this:

1. Merely claiming that a group of testimonies is worthless based on the circumstances of how they came to be does not prove that this is indeed so. This book demonstrates that what I summarized here is indeed true.
2. Psychologically speaking, modern forms of media (sound and video recordings) and interactive interview techniques as well as lectures delivered by “survivors” in front of unprepared crowds are much more-powerful and convincing than dry court transcripts and written affidavits recorded in the middle of the 20th Century. As a result, many readers, listeners and viewers of these more-recent interviews or presentations are lured into the trap of believing something simply because the experience of hearing a testimony felt so direct and personal.

For these two reasons, a book like this is required to set the record straight.

Introduction

With this study, I conclude the series of critical analyses of “eyewitness accounts” of self-styled members of the so-called Sonderkommando that I have undertaken over the years and collected in various works (Mattogno 2016, 2017, 2020b, 2021, 2021a, 2022b). In these studies, I critically examined the testimonies of five general categories of witnesses, which I list in order of importance:

1. Self-Proclaimed Eyewitnesses of the Sonderkommando

André Lettich, David Olère, the authors of buried manuscripts (an “unknown author,” Chaim Herman, Salmen Gradowski, Leib Langfus, Salmen Lewental, Marcel Nadsari [Nadjari]), Szaja Gertner, an anonymous Polish witness of 1945, Roman Sompolinski, Charles Sigismund Bendel, Milton (Meilech) Buki, Miklós Nyiszli, Polish Anonymous Witness of 1946, Arnošt (Ernst, Arnold) Rosin, Filip Müller, Dov Paisikovic, Stanisław Jankowski, Henryk Mandelbaum, Ludwik Nagraba, Joshuah Rosenblum, Aaron Pilo, David Flia-menbaum, Samij Karolonsij, Shlomo Venezia, Szlama Dragon, Henryk Tauber.

2. Non-Sonderkommando Witnesses Who Worked in the Crematoria

An unnamed Hungarian witness, Protocol No. 90 (June 23, 1945); unnamed Hungarian witness, Protocol No. 151 (June 27, 1945); unnamed Hungarian witness, Protocol No. 182 (June 30, 1945); unnamed Hungarian witness, Protocol No. 2121 (August 26, 1945).

3. Testimonies of Prisoners Who Claim to Have Escaped a Gassing

Abraham Cykert (1945), Regina Bialek (1945), Sofia Litwinska (1945), Bruno Piazza (1956).

4. Incidental Witnesses to the Gas Chambers

Ada Bimko (1945), Jeannette Kaufmann (1945), Regina Plucer (1945), Hermine Kranz (1945), Fritz Putzker (1945), Isaac Egon Ochshorn (1945), Anonymous French Jewish Witness (1946), Helena Bard-Nomberg (1946), Wilhelm Wohlfarth, (1947) Franciszek Gulba (1970), Moshé Garbarz (1983).

5. Hearsay Testimonies of Inmates Receiving Information from Sonderkommando Members

Alfred Wetzler and Rudolf Vrba, Sofia Kaufmann Schafranov (1945), Marie Claude Vaillant-Couturier (1945), Marc Nahon (1945), Chaim Frosch (1945).¹

In the present study, I complete the list of the first group by analyzing the “eyewitness accounts” of twelve inmates who claim to have been members of the Sonderkommando. Some of them I have analyzed in earlier studies only as to certain aspects (for example, statements concerning the “bunkers” of Birkenau). Here, I will consider each in their entirety. Other witness statements, however, are new, in part even for orthodox historians.

Orthodox Auschwitz historiography famously states that the personnel in charge of the crematoria at Birkenau, who allegedly witnessed the immense exterminations in the local “gas chambers” and carried out the cremation of the bodies of the allegedly gassed, were called Sonderkommando, and that this was the only Sonderkommando that existed in the Auschwitz-Birkenau Complex, and this uniqueness derived from the fact that it was (allegedly) linked to “special treatment,” obviously in the sense of the gassing process.

In other studies I have shown that this designation is supported by only one document, the “Escape Report” of 7 September 1944,² in which a “Sonderkommando (Krematorium)” is mentioned, and that in this case the specification “Krematorium” served to distinguish this particular Sonderkommando from the many others that existed in the Auschwitz Camp, among them the Sonderkommando Pest Control (Schädlingsbekämpfung), the Sonderkommando-Reinhardt, the Sonderkommando Zeppelin, the Bauhof-Sonderkommando (construction yard), the Dwory-Sonderkommando, the Buna-Sonderkommando, the Bekleidungs-Werkstätte-Sonderkommando (clothing workshop), the Sonderkommando Sola-Hütte and others.³

It should be pointed out at the outset that no documents have been preserved on the Sonderkommando of the crematoria, apart from those, few and fragmentary, which allow us to know its real name and strength. In 1944, the inmates working in the crematoria of Birkenau were initially called “crematorium staff” (“Krematoriumspersonal,” 15 January to 15 February 1944),⁴ then

³ Ibid., p. 104; see also Mattogno 2016b, pp. 111-114.

⁴ Series of reports titled “Overview of number of inmates of Concentration Camp Auschwitz II and their deployment dated...” (“Übersicht über Anzahl und Einsatz der Häftlinge des Konzentra-

“Unit 206-B Stokers Crematorium I and II” and “...III and IV” (“Kommando 206-B Heizer Krematorium I. u. II” and “...III. u. IV,” April and May 1944),⁵ and finally (from end of July through October 1944):

Kommando 57-B	Heizer Krematorium I Tag [day]
Kommando 57-B	Heizer Krematorium I Nacht [night]
Kommando 58-B	Heizer Krematorium II Nacht
Kommando 58-B	Heizer Krematorium II Tag
Kommando 59-B	Heizer Krematorium III Tag
Kommando 59-B	Heizer Krematorium III Nacht
Kommando 60-B	Heizer Krematorium IV Nacht
Kommando 60-B	Heizer Krematorium IV Tag.

From 29 July to 9 August, the total strength of these units was 900 stokers and 3 skilled workers, on 9 August it dropped to 894, and on the next day it dropped again to 870 stokers (and 3 or 4 skilled workers), and remained there until 7 September.⁶

The activities of the Sonderkommando are thus known exclusively from the accounts of self-proclaimed survivors, but here we encounter the first, inexplicable surprise: no witness ever mentioned these official designations. These Kommandos were part of the “SS Office Administration” (“SS-Dienststellen-Verwaltung”) and were preceded in various reports by other Kommandos: Baubetriebsdienststellen (51-B; construction management offices), Aufräumungskommando (52-B, 53-B and 54-B; tidying-up unit, three separate subunits), Essenwarensammlerkommando (55-B; food collection unit) and the Rollkommando (56-B), and it is clear that each unit was called by its name during roll calls.

As self-proclaimed eyewitnesses to the “gassings,” these “survivors” tried to create a narrative that is more or less consistent with their alleged assignment. Thus, they proclaimed themselves “carriers of secrets” whom the SS supposedly killed periodically, every three or four months. In their imagination, this was to be an indirect confirmation of the truthfulness of their accounts about homicidal gassings. But this was also the first hurdle, because the “survivors” had to explain how and why they had survived so many of these alleged killings. In accordance with their moderate intellectual capacities, they invented two absolutely insulting explanations: their miraculous mass-survival, and the stupidity of the SS. Some, such as Josef Sackar, prolonged the Sonderkommando’s life to six months (see below), perhaps in order to make their survival look a little less miraculous.

⁶ Series as before, for 28 July through 30 August, with a few gaps: APMO, AuII-3a. I recapitulate all the data in Mattogno 2016a, pp. 141-150.

But there is also another inexplicable and surprising fact: although the inmates knew about the periodic “expiration” of their Sonderkommando – and their awareness of their impending demise must have been known to the SS, who consequently should have feared riots – the number of guards inside the crematoria – according to the documents I mentioned earlier – stood at a constant 22 of them for 903 inmates from July 28 to August 30.⁷ This means that one guard had to handle an average of 41 inmates. At the end of September 1944, the SS is said to have “selected” and gassed about 200 inmates of the Sonderkommando in the disinfestation chamber of the so-called “Kanada I” warehouse at Auschwitz (Piper 2000, pp. 186f.). With this allegedly going on, they should have been much more circumspect in the crematoria, hence should have increased the guard-to-inmate ratio considerably. Yet instead, on 3 October 1944, the 662 inmates working in the crematoria at that time were guarded by only twelve guards,⁸ hence only one guard for 55 inmates!⁹

The testimonial narrative clashes with an even more disruptive obstacle, which concerns the final salvation of the “survivors” of the Sonderkommando, an event that Franciszek Piper described as follows (Piper 2000, pp. 188f.):

“Approximately 100 Sonderkommando members remained alive on January 18, 1945. During the final evacuation, they were led on foot along with other prisoners to Wodzisław, and then by train to the Mauthausen concentration camp. During a roll-call assembly there three days later, all Auschwitz Sonderkommando members were called on to step forward. The appeal was repeated twice, but no one responded. Without the appropriate records, the SS were unable to establish their identities. Thanks to this fact, some Auschwitz Sonderkommando members were able to survive until liberation, dispersed among other prisoners and transferred to various camps. Several others, including Szlama Dragon, Henryk Tauber, Henryk Mandelbaum and Alter Feinsilber, had escaped during the evacuation march to Wodzisław. Soon after liberation, they lodged extensive depositions with the authorities investigating Nazi war crimes.”

At this point, the witnesses abandoned the “miraculous” explanation and, with the complicity of the historians, adopted another no-less-foolish one: they projected their own stupidity onto the SS, to whom they consequently attributed irrational behavior.

The first of the series is the transfer of six “carriers of secrets” of the Sonderkommando (Wacław Lipka, Mieczysław Morawa, Józef Ilczuk, Władysław Biskup, Jan Agrestowki and Stanisław Slezak) to Mauthausen, on 5 January

⁷ With the exception of 23 guards on two of these days, and 24 on two other days.

⁸ APMO, D-AuII-3a/49, p. 93.

1945, where they were allegedly shot on 3 April.¹⁰ The transfer is documented, but the shooting is a pure invention. On 5 January 1945 the camp leader of the “Concentration Camp Auschwitz, Subcamp Birkenau, Men’s Camp” sent a letter to the headquarters with the subject “Transfer of 6 inmates from Auschwitz CC, Subcamp Birkenau, to Mauthausen CC on 5 January 1945,” in which the six above-mentioned inmates are listed.¹¹ On 7 January, they were registered at Mauthausen with the following registration numbers:¹²

- Agrostowski (sic), Jan, 114656
- Biskup, Wladyslaw, 114658
- Hczuk (sic), Josef, 114661
- Lipka Wacław, 114663
- Morawa Mieczysław, 114665
- Slezak Stanisław, 114658.

The “Inmate personnel card” of Ilczuk (the proper spelling of his name) from “CC Auschwitz II” shows, in a rectangle in the top-right corner, the Auschwitz registration number (14916), which is crossed out, and above it the new Mauthausen registration number (114661). In the middle column (the card consists of 3 columns) we read: “Transferred to Mauthausen CC on 5 January [19]45.” The card is crossed out with an oblique pencil stroke accompanied by the inscription “transferred 3 April [19]45.”¹³ Morawa’s “Inmate personnel card” looks similar: old number (5730) crossed out, new Mauthausen number written above it (114665), remark “Transferred to Mauthausen CC on 5 January [19]45,” oblique pencil stroke with the inscription “transferred 3 April [19]45.”¹⁴

In practice, Mauthausen Camp informed Auschwitz Camp that the two prisoners had been taken over and that they had been transferred away from Mauthausen Camp, as a result of which the Auschwitz cards were marked as cancelled. A document dated 7 January listing the admission of the six inmates in question (a total of 27 inmates are recorded there, Numbers 114655-114681) confirms that all were transferred on 3 April 1945: in the last column, the one for variations, we read “U 3.4.45,” where the letter U stands for “überstellt” – “transferred.” In front of the names of eight inmates, there is a small cross in red pencil, which means that they apparently died later, but there is no such red mark in front of the names of the six aforementioned inmates, so they really were transferred.

This shows that they were not “carriers of secrets” at all. Assuming that they knew of no terrible secrets, their transfer after 85 days makes sense, but it becomes completely inexplicable, even absurd, if we assume that they were indeed “carriers of secrets,” dangerous to the SS, who were to be killed, because during those 85 days of their stay at Mauthausen, they would have revealed their knowledge of this “terrible secret” of Auschwitz to the entire Mauthausen Camp. Not to mention the even-more-absurd fact that these inmates, allegedly slated for extermination, were evidently transferred away from an alleged extermination camp (Auschwitz), presumably to be killed in a simple concentration camp (Mauthausen)!

This fable, to which the Auschwitz Museum is desperately and stubbornly clinging, involves further logical absurdities.

Indeed, if as early as January 5 the Auschwitz SS had already considered and begun to carry out the killing of the “carriers of secrets” of the Sonderkommando, how is it possible that they foolishly allowed them to mingle with the other inmates 13 days later, on January 18?

The fable of the search for these “carriers of secrets” at Mauthausen Camp is comical: the SS at Auschwitz allegedly struggled to identify them among thousands of inmates by simply asking them to present themselves, hoping, as only fools would, that they would indeed turn themselves in, although these inmates must have been aware that they were slated to be executed. In this narrative, even more-stupidly, the SS did not have any “appropriate records,” meaning the lists of names and registration numbers of the Sonderkommando inmates. This, of course, only serves to give a semblance of credibility to this stolid story.

The scant extant documentation makes it possible to reconstruct the fate of the “survivors” as follows. Until 8 October 1944, the strength of the Sonderkommando was 661 inmates (excluding the skilled workers); on the 9th, it dropped to 212;¹⁵ from the 10th to the 26th, it dropped again to 198; on the 27th it was 199, and 200 on the 29th, 30th and 31st.¹⁶ On the 13th¹⁷ and 16th of January, only Kommando 53-B, “Stokers Crematory IV,” was still in existence, consisting of merely 30 inmates.¹⁸ On the 16th, a Kommando 104-B, “demolition squad” (“Abbruchkdo Krematorium”), which consisted of 70 inmates,¹⁹ was also active, but it is not documented that it consisted of “former members of the Special Squad,” as alleged by Danuta Czech in her entry for 15 January 1945 (Czech 1990, p. 779). If so, the (30 + 70 =) 100 Sonderkom- mando members remaining alive on 18 January 1945 were part of two units, the Kommando Krematorium and the demolition squad. Hence, if the SS at Auschwitz had really wanted to kill them, these inmates would not have had a chance to escape. As dangerous “carriers of secrets,” they would have been registered by the SS with name and registration number (as was the case for all Kommandos), so that, if any of them had miraculously managed to get to Mauthausen, they would have been easily identified when getting re-registered. On 25 January 1945, 5,714 inmates from Auschwitz arrived at this camp and were re-registered with discontinuous numbers from 116501 to 123538.²⁰

This transport included at least eleven self-proclaimed Sonderkommando inmates, who were registered with names that were sometimes partially or totally misspelled: Shaul Chasan (Saul Chasan), No. 117621; Shlomo Venezia (Sinto Beneti), No. 118554; Leon Cohen, No. 118658; Jaacov Gabai (Jacques Gabay), No. 118755; Dario Gabai (Dano Gahbai), No. 118757; Filip Müller (Filip Mueller), No. 119103; Marcel Nadjari (Marcel Nadjar), No. 119116; David Olère (Daniel Olere), No. 119138; Maurice Schellekes (Maurice Schellevis), No. 119327; Sigismund Bendel, No. 119537; Daniel Bennamias (Daniel Bennahmias), No. 119540.²¹

At Mauthausen, the registration was carried out in alphabetical order from A to Z in small groups that followed one another; with each new group, the registration started again from letter A. The inmates’ personnel cards (“Häftlings-Personal-Karte”) had a lot of free space, as shown by those of the Gabai brothers and Chasan,²² and it would have been easy to add the Auschwitz registration number (tattooed on the forearms of the inmates) at the request of the Auschwitz SS, so that it would have been possible to check later, with complete confidence, which inmates had been part of the Sonderkommando.

The aforementioned registration list is not an original document, but a post-war reconstruction. The original lists, such as those of Buchenwald Camp, are more-nuanced. For example, the transport that left Birkenau on 18 January and arrived in Buchenwald on 26 January included 3,927 inmates, who were registered on the relevant admissions list in eight columns (numbers 120348 through 124274):

- serial number
- Buchenwald registration number
- last name
- first name

It is therefore obvious that the Mauthausen SS could have easily identified any inmate who had arrived from Auschwitz, but it is easier to pretend to believe that the SS were a bunch of morons, completely incapable of handling the easiest situations.

All this already impugns profoundly the trustworthiness of the accounts of the self-proclaimed “survivors” of the Sonderkommando. The critical analysis of their testimonies fully confirms this assessment.

Most of the main and secondary witnesses of the Sonderkommando that I have already analyzed, as many as 17, testified for the first time between 1945 and 1947, and this is perfectly understandable; some waited two or three decades: Paisikovic made his first statements in 1963, Rosenblum in 1970. Inexplicably, a small group of self-proclaimed Sonderkommando members, united by origin (except for Szlama Dragon’s brother Abraham and Eliezer Eizenschmidt) – they were all Jews deported to Auschwitz from Greece (Josef Sackar, Jaacov Gabai, Shaul Chasan and Leon Cohen) – decided to tell their stories only between 1987 and 1993, in the form of interviews conducted by Israeli historian Gideon Greif, who then published them in 1995 in German (Greif 1995), and ten years later also in an English translation titled We Wept without Tears: Testimonies of the Jewish Sonderkommando from Auschwitz (Greif 2005). The statements of these late “eyewitnesses” constitute the main subject of this present study.

Since the beginning of the 1990s other Greek “survivors” of the Sonderkommando, who until then had remained silent, suddenly felt the imperative “duty to testify”: Daniel Bennahmias in 1993 (Camhi Fromer), and Leon Cohen, already interviewed by Gideon Greif, in 1996 (Cohen).

The crown of laggards, however, unquestionably belongs to Shlomo Venezia, a Jew with Italian citizenship who was deported to Auschwitz from Thessaloniki. After an insignificant media excursion in 1992, he officially entered the Auschwitz martyrology on 3 December 2000, thanks to three German scholars, Eric Friedler, Barbara Siebert and Andreas Kilian, who interviewed him. But it was only after the 2007 publication of his memoirs – in French and then in Italian – that he rose to a prestigious position in Holocaust memoiriology as the last “eyewitness” of the “gas chambers” of Auschwitz. In practice, he waited 55 years to “testify,” if we start counting from the end of the Second World War. In this study, I take up and amplify my detailed analysis that has already appeared in Italian, whose title translates to The Truth about the Gas Chambers? Anatomy of the “Unique Testimony” of Shlomo Venezia (“La veri-tà sulle camere a gas”? Anatomia della “testimonianza unica” di Shlomo Venezia).

The three German scholars mentioned above continued the work begun by Gideon Greif, interviewing other self-proclaimed Sonderkommando members, some previously unknown, such as André Balbin, Erko and Samuel Hejblum. However, if we follow the German interviewers, these witnesses were only part of the Sonderkommando that worked on the exhumation and immolation of the corpses of those who are said to have been buried after allegedly having been gassed in 1942. Their statements are reported in a very fragmentary way, which does not allow an overall assessment of the trustworthiness of these witnesses.

Friedler et al. do not even seem to be aware of the basic contradiction that these statements imply with respect to the orthodox narrative as laid out in Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, which they otherwise follow very closely.

Danuta Czech insists, and Friedler et al. confirm it (pp. 96f.), that this Sonderkommando was exterminated on 3 December 1942 (Czech 1990, pp. 277f.):

“The approximately 300 Jewish prisoners in the special squad who dig up and burn the 107,000 bodies buried in mass graves are taken from Birkenau to the main camp by the SS. There they are led to the gas chamber in Crematorium I and killed with gas. Thus the witnesses to the corpse burning are disposed of.”

In this regard, Maurice Schellekes’s account (to whom I devote Chapter 11) is particularly significant. He worked about a month in the Sonderkommando (roughly from mid-August to mid-September 1942), after which he was subjected to a “selection,” yet instead of being killed, he was transferred to the Auschwitz Main Camp and assigned to the “potato-peeling squad,” the “gravel squad” and the “Kanada-Kommando.” On 25 January 1945, he arrived at Mauthausen, where he received the registration number 119327.²⁴ This means that the Auschwitz SS thought they had nothing to fear from these grave-exhuming inmates, meaning they did not think of them as “carriers of secrets” at all.²⁵

On the historical value of testimonies recorded more than forty or even fifty years after the alleged events I will dwell in the Conclusion.

In this study, I also deal with two practically unknown Sonderkommando witnesses: David Lea, a Jew deported from Greece, who was one of the first to recount his alleged experiences (August 12, 1946), and Franz Süss, a Slovakian Jew whose testimony dates back to 1964.

Six witnesses deported from Greece all arrived at Auschwitz on 11 April 1944 – with a transport of 2,500 Jews, of whom 320 men (182440-182759) and 328 women (76856-77183; Czech 1990, p. 609) were registered and received very-close registration numbers:

- Josef Sackar: 182739
- Jaacov Gabai: 182569
- Shaul Chasan: 182527
- Leon Cohen: 182492
- Daniel Bennahmias: 182477
- Shlomo Venezia: 182727.

According to his own account, Josef Sackar arrived at Auschwitz on 14 April 1944 (p. 91)²⁶ – in fact on 11 April – and received Registration Number 182739. He spent “three weeks” in the Quarantine Camp BIIa.

“One evening, when the first transports from Hungary arrived, they did another Selektion and between 200 and 220 Greeks were removed from our transport. They led us to special barracks – they called them Blocks – numbers 11 and 13, if I’m not mistaken.” (p. 92)

Presumably the next day, Sackar was taken to the “bunker” (p. 93)

Jaacov Gabai arrived at Auschwitz with a transport of 2,500 people (p. 184). “Seven hundred people in the transport were selected” (p. 185). Those selected were taken to the Quarantine Camp, and “Twenty days after we’d come – on May 12, 1944 – there was another selection,” during which the SS physicians “selected the three hundred strongest and healthiest men” (ibid.).

On 15 May 1944, the 300 inmates taken from quarantine were divided into two groups, one of which was assigned to Crematorium II, the other to Crematorium III. Gabai was sent to Crematorium II, together with his brother Dario Gabai, with Leon Cohen, Shlomo and Maurice Venezia as well as Daniel ben Nachmias [Bennahmias] (p. 186).

After Shaul Chasan had arrived at Auschwitz, he, too, was admitted to the Quarantine Camp, where he stayed “two weeks,” after which the SS “picked out 250 strong men for labor.”²⁷ During the first day of work, he was deployed at the “bunker” (p. 264)

²⁷ Greif 2005, p. 264; “200” in the German edition, 1995, p. 228; Greif’s follow-up question speaks of 200 men, so 250 is probably a typo in the English edition.

Leon Cohen recalled arriving at Auschwitz “in late November [1943]” (p. 292), but his registration number, 182492, was issued on 11 April 1944. He was then sent to the Quarantine Camp, where he remained “a month” with about 200 deported Greek Jews (p. 293), of whom “about 150” were selected for the Sonderkommando. “It was exactly a month after we’d been quarantined.” These 150 selected men were brought to Block 13 of the Birkenau Camp (p. 294). The next morning, he was led to what is today called “Bunker 2.” (p. 294)

Daniel Bennahmias did not provide direct information about his arrival at Auschwitz. Rebecca Camhi Fromer, who collected his testimony, writes that he was registered at the “sauna” and sent to quarantine “for a period of about six weeks” (Camhi Fromer, p. 31); he was sent to a barracks in which about 300 people were housed, “largely, but not exclusively, Greek Jews” (ibid., p. 32). Later, at an unspecified date, “forty to fifty men were selected. They were the youngest and the strongest, and Danny and Dario [Gabai] were among them – but everyone in the barracks had understood his chance of being selected on the strength of the first few choices. The men now dressed, and those selected were marched to Block 13, Lager D.” (Ibid., p. 36)

Rebecca Camhi Fromer then explains that “approximately 180 men were housed in Block 13 in all. Danny was one of fifty to have arrived, about fifty were in the block, and about eighty were out ‘working.’” (Ibid.)

She adds:

“By the evening of the same day, fifteen of the new recruits who had been selected from Danny’s barracks were to be taken on a very strange journey. Danny was among them. He was taken on a ‘tour’ designed to shock, and he does not remember if Dario was with him at that time.”

These 15 inmates were taken to Crematorium II (ibid., p. 37).

Shlomo Venezia stated that he remained in quarantine for three weeks, then officers showed up and selected 70 or 80 inmates. The next morning he, with an undetermined group of inmates, was taken to Crematorium III. I return to his testimony in detail in Chapter 6.

The statements of these witnesses are somewhat discordant. They remained in quarantine for two weeks (Chasan), for three weeks (Sackar, Venezia, Gabai: 20 days), for four weeks (Cohen: one month) or for six weeks (Bennahmias). The inmates selected for the Sonderkommando numbered 40-50 (Bennahmias), 80 (Venezia) 150 (Cohen), 200 or 200-220 (Chasan and Sackar), or 300 (Gabai). Finally, Sackar, Chasan, Cohen and Venezia (but his statements are contradictory) were sent to what is called today “Bunker 2” on the first day of work, but Gabai was sent to Crematorium II (together with Leon Cohen, although he claimed to have been taken to “Bunker 2”), and Ben-nahmias was also sent to this crematorium.

For 13 April 1944, Otto Wolken’s “quarantine list”²⁸ records the arrival of 320 Greek Jews from Athens at Camp BIIa, Block 12, who were given the registration numbers 182440 through 182759; the “end of quarantine” was scheduled for 11 May, but there appears the annotation: “ab[gang] 200 /12.5” and “[Abgang] 30/5.6.”²⁹ meaning that 200 of them were released from quarantine on 12 May, and 30 more on 5 June.

There is no documentary evidence that these 200 inmates were assigned to the Sonderkommando, however I assume as a working hypothesis that this is true.

The date of May 12, 1944 is fundamental to the chronology of the testimonies, because it is the starting point of the events they recount. In fact, four Greek witnesses stated that they had worked in “Bunker 2” the next day, thus on May 13, 1944.

Danuta Czech states that Rudolf Höss ordered on 9 May 1944 that “Bunker 2 is to be put back into operation, incineration trenches are to be dug next to it, barracks for use as disrobing rooms are to be built” (Czech 1990, p. 622). The first two Jewish transports from Hungary left on May 14: 3,200 people from Nyíregyháza and 3,169 from Munkács.³⁰ They arrived at Auschwitz on 16 May, the day on which their alleged extermination began. (“From this night on [all] the chimneys of the crematoriums begin to smoke”; Czech 1989, p. 776 (“alle”); 1990, p. 627 (without “all”).)

This means that according to this narrative, “Bunker 2” was not yet in operation on 13 May, so the witnesses could not have seen the gassings and cremations they describe.

Since these witnesses often made similar statements, I will examine them grouped comparatively on occasion, so as not to have to repeat the same observations for each.

²⁸ With reference to the “Quarantine List,” Czech wrote erroneously that these Greek inmates were registered on 11 April (in Camp Sector BIIa), instead of 13 April (1990, p. 609).

Thirteen False Witness Testimonies

1. Josef Sackar

At the end of the quarantine period, the witness was assigned to the Sonderkommando of the “bunkers”, which he described only fleetingly:

“[Greif] Do you remember your first day of work in the Sonderkommando?

I remember it very well. We were in Camp D, and one evening we were taken behind the last crematorium building. There I saw the most horrific thing I’d ever seen in my whole life. A small transport had arrived that evening. They didn’t order us to work; they just took us there so we’d get used to the sight of it. They’d dug some pits out there; they called them ‘bunkers.’ The bodies were taken from the gas chambers and cremated there. They took the bodies to these bunkers, tossed them in, and burned them.

[Greif] How? What fuel did they use for the fire?

Wood and other flammable materials. They lit the wood and burned the bodies.

[Greif] Were these the bunkers that were used in the previous period in Birkenau?

When I was there, they began to use the bunkers again when the Jews from Hungary arrived. There was no room left in the crematorium furnaces then, so they went back to using the bunkers.

[Greif] Did you work at the bunkers?

I saw how one bunker worked but I didn’t work there.

[Greif] Can you describe the bunker?

Yes. It was a pit, not very large, where they brought the bodies and threw them in. The pits were deep and they scattered pieces of wood at the bottom. The bodies were brought from the gas chambers to the pits, where they threw them in. All the pits were outdoors, under the stars. There were quite a few of them. Where they burned bodies.” (p. 93)

According to orthodox historiography, a farm house existed in 1944 at Birkenau that had allegedly been adapted to serve as a homicidal gassing facility in 1942. The terms used by witnesses for this building are multifarious and imaginative: “Bunker” 2, 5, V, 2/V, 2/5 or “Installation V” (“urządzenie V”). The house is said to have measured 8.34 m × 17.07 m, and allegedly contained four gas chambers, each with one entrance and one exit door. Given the total lack of documents and the contradictory nature of the testimonies, Franciszek Piper carefully avoids providing precise data on the alleged “cremation pits” and undressing huts that presumably accompanied this facility (his treatment of “Bunker 2” is exhausted in a few lines):

“In May 1944, during the killing of the Hungarian Jews, it was put back into operation. Several new burning pits were dug and a new [undressing] barracks for undressing constructed at that time.” (Piper 2000, p. 143)³¹

How many “cremation pits” were there? What size were they? What was their daily capacity? How many undressing huts were there? Elementary questions that Piper carefully avoids addressing. The Sonderkommando “survivors” who explicitly answered these questions, Dov Paisikovic and Filip Müller, did so in a contradictory manner. Both named the alleged gassing installation “Bunker 5,” but the former stated that it was equipped with two “cremation pits” measuring 30 m × 10 m × 3 m or 30 m × 6 m × 3 m, while the latter claimed four “cremation pits” measuring 40-50 m × 8 m × 2 m or 40 m × 8 m × 2.5 m.³² Müller claimed moreover that there were “three wooden barracks” near “bunker 5” (Müller 1979, p. 133).

I may point out again that, for the “survivors” of the Sonderkommando mentioned above, the first day of work was 13 May 1944. Even if we leave aside the fact that these “bunkers” – however one wants to call them – never existed as a gassing installation (see Mattogno 2016), it is certain that on 31 May 1944 the area of “Bunker 2” did not show any sign of human activity, of any smoking or non-smoking “cremation pits,” nor of any barracks. Indeed, the path that is said to have given access to this area was blocked by a hedge,³³ so any claim to the contrary, such as that of Sackar, is simply false.

In particular, Sackar did not even know where the “Bunker” was supposed to be located, because he says it was “behind the last crematorium building”

³¹ The English translation, missing the term “undressing,” is inaccurate. The Polish text says “nowe baraki-rozbieralnie,” “new undressing barracks,” which was rendered correctly in the German translation as “neue Auskleidebaracken.” F. (p. 93), hence Crematorium V, and here the adverb “behind” can only mean its northern courtyard, where some “cremation pits” are claimed to have been located. The little Polish house renamed “Bunker 2” was instead located outside the camp, about 250 meters west of the Zentralsauna, which was the most-important installation closest to it and also the most visible one, more precisely on the extension of the fence line that separated the area of the Effektenlager (inmate-property storage area; east of the Zentralsauna) from that of Crematorium IV.³⁴

After visiting the “bunkers,” evidently so that he could “testify” about them after the war, since he did nothing there (“I saw how one bunker worked but I didn’t work there,” ibid.), Sackar was first transferred to Crematorium IV, where he worked “a few days,” precisely “three days” (p. 94), then he was assigned to Crematorium III, about which he reported:

“It was surrounded with a fence of sorts, made from piles of logs, two meters high, so that you wouldn’t notice a thing from the outside.” (p. 95)

On the facing page of the German edition, Greif reproduces a 1945 drawing by David Olère with this caption:

“Crematorium III in action (view from south-west). A car with a red cross brings Zyklon B, while a line of people who can no longer work moves to the back of the building. In the foreground on the right, a truck that will take away the victims’ clothes.” (Greif 1995, p. 13)

The only thing missing from this caption is a reference to the absurd flame-spewing chimney. Although the drawing is in black and white, Olère has drawn obvious flames shooting from the crematorium chimney, and this is confirmed by a parallel drawing in color, where the orange flames shoot out even higher into the night sky.³⁵ But the drawing is important for another detail: in the foreground, in the lower right corner, are drawn about 15 logs leaning against the fence, which obviously do not cover the view of the crematorium at all. A far-more-substantial woodpile was actually located in the northern courtyard of Crematorium V, which can be seen in an aerial photograph of 19 February 1945 and on a ground photo from the spring of 1945 (Mattogno 2016a, Docs. 43f., pp. 184f.). Sackar’s phantom “piles of logs” probably derives from a literary reworking of these two elements.

The witness does not elaborate much on the claimed gas chambers and gassings, so I examine the relevant statements below in broader contexts. Here, I limit myself to considering only a few, although not irrelevant points. First of all, his brief comment on how the gas was introduced into the execution chamber:

³⁵ Olère, p. 50. The drawing published in Greif 1995 is on page 51.

“There were just four openings, through which the SS men threw in the gas in order to kill the people. To keep air from coming in, they would close the lids above the openings.” (p. 95)

The witness did not explain what type of “lid” (made of metal, wood or cement?), but curiously reverses their function: they were not used to prevent the poisonous cyanide vapors from seeping out of the gas chamber, but to prevent fresh air from getting inside.

He takes up the (undocumented) story of the alleged gas chamber’s division into two rooms:

“There was one room that could be divided into two. When a small transport came – two hundred, three hundred, or five hundred people – they opened only one room by closing the door in the middle of the room that led to a section that made the room longer.” (p. 110)

The witness is mistaken in this regard, because based on Henryk Tauber’s testimony, the orthodoxy insists that such a division exclusively occurred inside Crematorium II (although this is not supported by any document),³⁶ although Franciszek Piper falsely attributed it also to Crematorium III (Piper 2000, p. 166):

“At end of 1943, the gas chambers in both these crematoria [II & III] were partitioned into two halves, connected by a door identical to the main door of the gas chamber. Smaller transports were subsequently led into the rear half of the chamber.”

In the relevant footnote, Piper refers to the testimony of Henryk Tauber and an “account of Władysław Girska, ARMAB, Collection of Testimonies, col. 44, p. 33.” Let us therefore examine Girska’s claims.

Piotr Setkiewicz published an “Excerpt from an account by Polish former prisoner Władysław Girska, camp number 12601, assigned to the repair of the crematoria in Birkenau” (Setkiewicz, p. 44). I quote the part about Crematoria II and III:

“In the Auschwitz II (Birkenau) crematoria I repaired the fire shafts leading to the chimneys. According to the regulations I bricked the internal walls of the shafts with clay bricks. I placed fresh clay brickwork in the places where the clay bricks had burned out. The melted clay bricks attested to high and prolonged temperatures (above 1,500 degrees C). I also used this repair method to fix the outlet chimneys. Aside from this work, I also replaced burned-out clay trestles in the furnaces for burning corpses.

In the gas chambers of crematoria II (I), III (II)^[37] in Auschwitz II (Birkenau) I built partition walls (one in each gas chamber) in order to reduce the large capacity of the chamber when gassing smaller transports. This technical solution for the gas chambers gave the Germans a chance to save Zyklon.

I saw that in the ceiling of the gas chambers of crematoria II (I) and III (II), two or three rectangular openings had been made with sides measuring about 40 cm. In each of these openings a steel screen was attached to thick steel reinforcing rods. A fitted lid closed or opened the openings in the ceiling. (...).

In crematoria IV (III), V (IV) I replaced the clay trestles and the internal walls of the chimneys."

It is not known why such an important witness, and a Polish one at that, neither testified during the Höss Trial nor during the trial against former members of the Auschwitz camp garrison. Girs'a's "account" is not dated, but it is undoubtedly very late in relation to these trials.

Girs'a presents himself as a specialist of the Auschwitz-Birkenau cremation facilities, since he himself allegedly carried out repairs of the smoke ducts, chimneys and furnaces of the four crematoria at Birkenau.

As the documents show, these are a charlatan's boasts with no basis in reality.

As far as Crematoria II and III are concerned, the main damage to the smoke ducts and the chimney occurred in the second half of March 1943. The repairs were carried out by the Robert Koehler Company. The smoke ducts were repaired during the last week of May, and the chimney was repaired between mid-July and the end of August, because a new project design was required for it that was delayed.³⁸ The Koehler Company, which built the smoke ducts and the chimneys of the crematoria, employed its own staff, as attested to by the letter of the Birkenau Construction Office to the Birkenau camp headquarters with the subject "Permission to enter the compounds of Crematoria I – V" dated 13 May 1944:³⁹

"The mason Apolinary Golinski, born 5 Aug. 1904, is assigned by the Koehler Company to do repair work at the crematoria. It is requested to provide his temporary pass with permission to enter the same."

Repairs to the cremation furnaces were carried out by the foremen of the company J.A. Topf & Sons, Erfurt, Martin Holik and Wilhelm Koch.

The inner lining of the smoke ducts, along their entire length, and of the chimneys (up to 6 meters high) was obviously made of refractory bricks. This fact is attested to by various documents, including: a letter by Topf & Sons to the Central Construction Office with the subject "Crematorium, Topf 8-muffle cremation furnace" dated 31 August 1942 ("During construction of the chimneys, refractory lining up to 6 m in height is sufficient");⁴⁰ a letter by Topf &

³⁸ I describe in detail the repairs carried out in the crematoria of Auschwitz-Birkenau in another study: Mattogno/Deana, Part 1, Unit 2, Subchapters 6.2f., pp. 228-251.

Sons to the Central Construction Office with the subject “Crematorium, cremation furnaces” dated 30 September 1942 (“Refractory material for the smoke duct [of Crematorium III]”);⁴¹ a letter by the Central Construction Office to Topf & Sons with the subject “Auschwitz CC, PoW Camp. Second crematorium with 5 x 3-muffle cremation furnaces” dated 26 October 1942 (“Refractory material for smoke ducts”);⁴² a letter by the Central Construction Office to Topf & Sons with the subject “Auschwitz CC, Crematorium II” dated 17 July 1943 (“The refractory lining for the damaged or collapsed interior of the chimney in Crema II”);⁴³ and a “file memo” by the Central Construction Office with the subject “Discussion about absorption of costs incurred by the rebuilding of the damaged chimney lining in Crematorium II KGL BW 30” dated 14 September 1943, which states that the refractory lining of the chimney was 12 centimeters thick and 6 meters high.⁴⁴

According to the documents, moreover, the refractory bricks of the smoke ducts of Crematorium II did not melt, but according to the letter of 17 July mentioned earlier, “in places, entire vault parts have collapsed,” while the temperature of 1,500°C in the smoke ducts mentioned by Girsas is ridiculous, considering that the fireplaces themselves were normally operated only at a temperature of some 1,300°C.⁴⁵

This is further confirmation that Girsas was a charlatan. But there is more.

From the orthodox perspective, an “eyewitness” who had built a partition of the alleged gas chamber of Crematoria II and III could not have failed to notice the claimed four 70-cm-wide openings for the introduction of Zyklon B (see below, Chapter 3), so Girsas’s statement in this regard – “two or three rectangular openings had been made with sides measuring about 40 cm” – is inexplicable.

Finally, it is clear from his account that he was well-aware of the (allegedly) criminal character of the crematorium, and he also explains the purpose of the (alleged) division of Morgue 1 of Crematoria II and III into two rooms. In this way, he too would have fallen into the category of (alleged) “carriers of secrets,” and the Auschwitz SS would have slated this dangerous “eyewitness” for execution. Yet instead, they transferred him without concern to another camp in November 1944.⁴⁶

Here it should be pointed out that, according to Daniel Bennahmias, the division into two “gas chambers” was carried out only in Crematorium III. In Chapter 5, where I examine his testimony, I will complete the argument by showing the absurdity of this alleged division.

⁴⁶ The first page (where Girsas is recorded as “Giersas,” Registration Number 12601, as No. 45) and the final page of the transport list were published by Irena Strzelecka (Strzelecka 1998, p. 250).

This closes my remarks on Girsá's account, and I return to Sackar.

His description of the alleged gassing procedure is simplistic and fanciful:

"About half an hour later they opened the door." (p. 112)

"Slowly we opened the lids in order to release the gas. Afterwards, we also opened the door of the gas chamber." (p. 104)

Sackar was unaware of the presence of the alleged gas chamber's ventilation system, and naively believed that ventilation took place through "venting holes at the top." But these "venting holes" did not exist at all, unless he meant the four claimed "openings" for the introduction of Zyklon B, which in that case would rather have been called "introduction holes," but this is very unlikely, because he insisted that the holes served "to let the gas out." On the other hand, the alleged four "openings" measured only 35 x 35 cm (p. 110), hence 0.49 square meters – out of a total room floor area of 210 m², which makes it even less likely that it would have been possible to enter the room without other ventilation openings or devices.⁴⁷

Under the four "openings" were as many "pillars" for pouring in Zyklon B, which I will deal with later. Here I only examine their positioning:

"[Greif] Where did these pillars stand?"

In the middle of the room, in the middle of the gas chamber. In the middle, between the two parts of the room. In the middle of the room, along it, two in each room." (p. 110)

But it is well known that "in the middle of the room" there was a 40 cm × 40 cm longitudinal reinforced-concrete beam that supported the ceiling together with seven vertical pillars. Therefore, any "opening" could not have been located in the middle, but would have had to be arranged either to the right or to the left of the beam.

On the other hand, from the orthodox perspective, Morgue 1 of Crematorium III is said to have been converted into a homicidal gas chamber when it was still a single room, so the four alleged "openings" would have had to be located at regular intervals along the 30 meter-long ceiling, e.g. at equidistant intervals, 6 meters apart from each other and from the two end walls. But if the two alleged gas chambers (meaning the entire, undivided room) could hold 2,000 persons (p. 97), while the smaller part of the divided chamber is said to have been used for transports of 200-500 persons, it is clear that it would have had at most a quarter of the total area, meaning that it would have been a section of Morgue 1 some 7.5 to 8 meters long, and there could have been only one "opening."

This (like everything else) shows that Sackar's narrative was not the result of actual observations.

⁴⁷ I will analyze Sackar's related statements in Chapter 4.

His account of the crematoria, also rather drab, will be examined later. Here I merely report a gross folly:

“If Crematorium II [III] was still full, they led the victims to Crematorium I [II] or Crematorium III [IV], depending on the situation. There were days when about twenty thousand people were cremated.” (p. 116)

With or without the “cremation pits”? It doesn’t matter, because it is nonsense either way.

Regarding his “salvation,” Sackar also tells the fable of SS stupidity, which I cite in its overall context (Greif 1995, p. 42):

“We knew that every six months people from the Sonderkommando were murdered by the Germans.”

This passage was censored in the English translation, where we read instead:

“We knew that the Germans had murdered lots of Sonderkommando men during the months before I arrived.” (p. 117)

He worked in the Sonderkommando “[f]rom May 1944 to January 1945, seven months in all” (ibid.), so he was already lucky not to have been killed after six months. Since this statement follows the previous one directly, this glaring contradiction between murderous claim and actual survival was probably the reason why that sentence was changed in the English translation.

Anyway, in November 1944, he joined the Crematorium Demolition Squad, and was still employed there in January 1945.

2. Jaacov Gabai

Born in Athens in 1912 to a Greek mother and an Italian father, this witness, as already mentioned, was deported to Auschwitz on a transport from Athens containing 2,500 Jews. The train left on 1 April 1944, and arrived at the camp on 11 April.

“Seven hundred people in the transport were selected, including my brother and me, and we all had to walk three kilometers to Birkenau.” (p. 185)

At that time, the transports were unloaded on the “old ramp,” which was located in front of the Birkenau Camp, at a distance of about 500 meters from the east side, where the main entrance is located.

After a few days, Gabai received Registration Number 182569.

“Twenty days after we’d come – on May 12, 1944 – there was another Selektion, a stricter one. Two doctors came with two officers. We had to stand in front of them naked. A German doctor examined us without saying a thing and selected the three hundred strongest and healthiest men. [...] We were 750 people in all [in the Sonderkommando] – men who’d been in the camp for some time and prisoners who’d just come.” (p. 185)

“When we reached the camp after we’d been selected for the Sonderkommando, we had no further contact with the rest of the people in the camp. About 100 of us lived in the loft of Crematorium I [II], 100 in the loft of Crematorium II [III], and 750 at Crematoria III [IV] and IV [V].” (p. 186)

According to the witness, the 300 inmates allegedly selected on 12 May 1944 were assigned to the crematoria Sonderkommando, bringing its total strength to 750 inmates, but this is contradicted by the reports “Auschwitz II. Labor Deployment for dates...” of 14 and 15 May 1944,⁴⁸ which gives as the number of inmates working at the crematoria the following numbers:

Unit	Name	Skilled workers	Unskilled workers
14 May 1944
206-B	Stokers Crematorium I + II	1	39
207-B	Stokers Crematorium III + IV	2	38
Totals:		3	77
15 May 1944
206-B	Stokers Crematorium I + II	1	150
207-B	Stokers Crematorium III + IV	2	155

⁴⁸ APMO, D-AuI-3/1, pp. 332a, 333a.

The two extant reports prior to that are those of 20 April and 3 May. In both, the total number of “stokers” in the crematoria is given as three skilled workers and 214 unskilled workers,⁴⁹ meaning that this lower level was the normal strength at the time, and that the number of May 14 should be considered abnormally high (since no “selection” among the Sonderkommando members is claimed for the period 3-13 May 1944). The increase in the strength of the Sonderkommando on 15 May was therefore 101 prisoners, not 300, and the total strength amounted to 315, not 750. Based on these sources, Franciszek Piper confirms that the Sonderkommando increased by about 100 prisoners on 15 May 1944 (Piper 2000, p. 185), as does Danuta Czech (Czech 1990, p. 626).

“At the beginning of the week, on Monday, May 15, our group was divided up. One group went to Crematorium II [III] and we were taken to Crematorium I [II]. Our group was made up mainly of Greek Jews, including Michel Arditti, Josef Baruch of Corfu, the Cohen brothers, Shlomo and Maurice Venezia, me and my brother Dario Gabai, Leon Cohen, Marcel Nadjari, and Daniel Ben-Nachmias. We were told that we wouldn’t have to work on the first night, just watch. I remember that a transport from Hungary arrived a little before 5:30 P.M. [...]

I saw bodies on top of each other. There were about twenty-five hundred bodies there. [...]

We didn’t work the first night. We began to work only on the second night.” (p. 186.)

“After we had worked for three days, an order was given that half of the new Sonderkommando, including me, would be sent to Crematoria III [IV] and IV [V] because there were so many transports. They had to cremate 24,000 Hungarian Jews every day.” (p. 187)

The alleged transfer was to take place on 19 or 20 May 1944; the reason was the claim that 24,000 bodies were to be cremated per day.

A telegram from Edmund Veessenmayer, the Reich Plenipotentiary for Hungary, to Ambassador Carl Ritter, dated 20 May 1944, states that 62,644 Jews had been deported up to the day before.⁵⁰ In his telegram to the German Foreign Office of 13 June 1944, he informed them that up to that time 289,357 Jews had been deported in 92 trains,⁵¹ which means that in each train there were on average 3,145 people. We can deduce from this that up to 19 May, $(62,644 \div 3,145 =)$ 20 trains had left Hungary. In a telegram to the German Embassy in Bratislava dated 6 May 1944, Eberhard von Thadden, head of Section “Inland II” of the German Foreign Office, stated that the transport plan provided for the dispatch of “4 transports of Jews” starting on 15 May inclusive (Braham 1963, Doc. 156, p. 370). This figure is confirmed by the arrival at Auschwitz of 20 transports within five days, from the 15th to the 19th. In the telegram of 16 May 1944, referring to the situation of the day before, Veessenmayer advised:⁵²

“Four special trains leave daily, each with 3,000 Jews.”

However, the minimum travel time was two days, so by the 19th of May, twelve transports had arrived at Auschwitz with about 37,750 people. In his report of 26 May 1944, von Thadden wrote:⁵³

“According to determination so far, about 1/3 of the deported Jews are fit for work.”

Therefore, of the approximately 37,750 deportees, the number of those allegedly gassed and “cremated” could not have been more than about 25,200 within five days, which amounts to an average of just over 5,000 per day. Gabai’s claim about 24,000 Hungarian Jews being cremated “every day” is therefore a preposterous untruth.

The witness then claims that “several thousand Hungarian Jews were cremated in the bunkers” (p. 187), but only one “bunker” is said to have existed in 1944.

“Starting in late April and throughout May, large numbers of transports from Hungary reached Birkenau.”

However, the deportation of the Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz began only on 15 May 1944.

The witness then claims that, since the capacity of the crematoria was insufficient, pits were prepared where “where they could cremate thousands more,” and he continues:

“My Sonderkommando group worked next to the ‘Sauna’ building in the forest, across from Crematoria III [IV] and IV [V]. The pits where they cremated the leftover bodies from the crematorium were dug there. They called the pits ‘bunkers.’” (p. 187)

Therefore the “bunker” was not a gassing installation containing four gas chambers, as the orthodox narrative has it, but a set of cremation pits! The actual gassing evidently took place in Crematoria III and IV (= IV and V), as confirmed by the witness:

“They brought the bodies from the gas chamber to the bunker and that’s where they cremated them.” (p. 187)

This assertion therefore contradicts the orthodox narrative (and is thus false even from that perspective), yet Gabai claims to have been an “eyewitness” of this alleged fact (“I worked there for three days,” p. 187). Furthermore, it is clear that the witness knew nothing of the alleged cremation pits in the northern courtyard of Crematorium V.

He does not say how many pits there were, and he is also uncertain about the term “bunker,” which he uses both in the singular and plural, hence both for the entire set of pits as well as for each individual pit. In this regard, he simply states:

“About a thousand corpses were cremated every hour. The fat from the corpses kept the fire going.” (pp. 187f.)

This is absurd, as is clear from the comparison with the burning on pyres of cattle carcasses resulting from the epidemic of Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy (BSE, “mad-cow disease”) that broke out in 2001. In fact, an analysis of the data shows that the burning capacity was about 8 kg of carcass mass per hour and square meter of pyre surface.⁵⁴ It follows that, in order to burn $(60 \text{ kg/corpse}^{55} \times 1,000 \text{ corpses}) = 60,000 \text{ kg}$ of bodies in one hour, a burning surface of $(60,000 \text{ kg} \div 8 \text{ kg/hr/m}^2) = 7,500$ square meters would have been required, practically the entire pentagonal area that was located a few hundred meters north of the Zentralsauna, which contained the Polish house renamed “Bunker 2” by the orthodoxy, plus the two cremation pits with the dimension of $30 \text{ m} \times 10 \text{ m}$ or $30 \text{ m} \times 6 \text{ m} \times 6 \text{ m}$, as claimed by Dov Paisikovic.⁵⁶

The reference to human fat does not make sense either, because this is how the witness describes the structure of the cremation pits:

“The method of cremation in the bunkers was like this: they laid the bodies on a layer of logs, placed logs and boards on top of them, and more bodies on top of those, and so on, three layers or more.” (p. 187)

If human fat “kept the fire going,” what was the purpose of adding so much wood? At this point, Gabai evidently misunderstood the fable, retold by many witnesses, of the cremation being fueled exclusively by the corpses’ fat.

At an unspecified date, Gabai was transferred to Crematorium II (= III; p. 189). To the interviewer’s question “How did Crematorium II [III] look from the outside?,” he replied:

“You wouldn’t believe it – it looked like a factory building. There was a smokestack at the front, like any factory would have. Except for the stench of scorched human flesh that rose from the smokestack, you’d never imagine that people were being murdered there.” (p. 189)

A “stench of scorched human flesh” is another testimonial fairy tale like that of human fat. This stench in fact depends on the gases formed during the gasification phase of the corpse, which takes place at a temperature of 400-500°C; the less-flammable gases have an ignition temperature of 650-700°C,⁵⁷ so at 800°C – the operating temperature of the crematoria – such a phenomenon was impossible.

Gabai then states that the camp commandant issued orders to the SS doctor who carried out the selections on the Birkenau “ramp” as to the percentage of those who had to be selected:

“10 percent today, 15 percent tomorrow, 20 percent the next day, and so on. There were also transports where 100 percent went to death without a selection. The selection was done without criteria of any kind. The German team that did it set the quota in accordance with the percentages that the camp commander determined.” (p. 189)

These claims are completely unfounded. The selections were carried out neither arbitrarily nor on the basis of predetermined percentages, but by a serious examination of the working capacity of the deportees. This is clear from a series of reports drawn up every five days by the camp physician of Auschwitz Concentration Camp and submitted to the camp’s headquarters, to First Leader of the Protective-Custody Camp, concerning the inspection of newly admitted deportees (Neuzugänge) on the ramp, which are listed in these reports with their registration numbers, origin of the transports, and medical assessment. The ten reports that have been preserved record the examination of 6,924 inmates, of whom 6,480 were declared “healthy and fit for labor,” 640 “fit for light labor,” and only 85 “unfit for labor.” So already the preliminary selection had identified 98.8% of the deportees as fit to work, so it had been carried out conscientiously and responsibly.

The claimed case of a transport that did not undergo any selection (and would therefore have been gassed entirely) is actually one of the numerous fictitious transports invented by witnesses and by Danuta Czech, as I have shown in a separate study (Mattogno 2022).

“Each crematorium had an Oberfeldwebel (sergeant major) who announced each morning whether his crematorium did or didn’t have room. The sergeant major of our crematorium was a lowly red-haired thug from Berlin.” (p. 190)

The rank of Oberfeldwebel belonged to the Wehrmacht and corresponded to that of an SS Hauptscharführer. No Wehrmacht non-commissioned officer was ever assigned to serve in the crematoria at Birkenau. But for Gabai, a “sergeant named Grünberg” even served in the “bunker” in May 1944 (p. 188). This character is completely invented.

To the interviewer’s question “Please describe a few transports that remain etched in your memory,” Gabai replied:

⁵⁷ Maccone, p. 104. The optimum cremation temperature in civilian crematoria heated with coke was 800-900°C.

“I have strong memories of a transport that came from Greece in June 1944, with two thousand people. It was the last transport from Greece and all the Jews were sent to their death without a Selektion. It was done by order of the camp commander. Everyone in this transport went up in flames, without exception.” (p. 191)

From March 20, 1943 to August 16, 1944, 22 Jewish transports were deported to Auschwitz from Greece, with a total of 54,533 persons. In June 1944 only one transport arrived there (on the 30th): 2,044 persons from Athens and Corfu, of whom 446 men and 175 women were registered,⁵⁸ and it is also probable that a certain number of deportees (as happened to the Hungarian ones) were sent directly to the Birkenau Transit Camp without registration. Moreover, this was not even “the last transport from Greece,” so the witness is wrong on both points.

The witness states that the last 400 “Muselmänner” (emaciated inmates) were killed on 31 October 1944 (“on October 31, 1944, when the last four hundred Muselmänner were led to their death,” p. 190). Danuta Czech knows nothing of this alleged fact (Czech 1990, p. 742), so not even the orthodoxy considers this as a proven fact.

“A large transport from Lodz came in August 1944 and that month 250 Polish Muselmänner were sent from several camps on the outskirts of Auschwitz.” (p. 192)

For this month, Czech records the alleged arrival of as many as eight transports from Łódź (from 15 to 30 August), of which Gabai knew nothing, because according to him, “in August there were almost no more transports.” (p. 190).

“In late June 1944, prisoners from the Gypsy camp were brought over. They resisted because they didn’t want to go to the crematorium. They were all still healthy.” (p. 191)

With these few sentences, the witness describes the alleged gassing of the Birkenau Gypsy Camp. However, according to Czech, this did not take place “in late June,” but purportedly on 2 August 1944, and it involved 2,897 “defenseless women, men, and children,” who therefore could not rebel by definition. By the phrase “They were all still healthy,” Gabai evidently means that the victims were all fit for work, but were gassed anyway. But Czech claims that the Gypsies (males and females) who were able to work, numbering 1,408, were previously transferred and were not killed.⁵⁹

“One day in the middle of July 1944, at three o’clock in the morning, a transport with at least fifteen hundred people came in. They were Jews from Hungary – men, women, and infants. [...] In August 1944, fewer and fewer transports from Hungary came.” (pp. 191f.)

But it is precisely recorded that the deportation of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz ended on 8 July 1944, and that, according to the “List of Transports of Jews (Women),” the last transports arrived there on the 11th of July.⁶⁰

“I kept a diary. I began it on my first day with the Sonderkommando and kept it until January 18, 1945, when I was liberated. I kept records every day. Almost five hundred pages. Everyday [sic] I wrote down the most ordinary events, like, ‘Today such and such happened...’ or ‘Today we did such and such work...’ Every day I wrote down what I did in the Sonderkommando. [...]

[Greif] Where did you leave your diary?

There, without burying it. But even though the diary was lost, I remember lots and lots of dates and I’ll never forget them. I have a good memory for exact dates; they never slip my mind.

[Greif] Can you list those dates?

First day of work in the Sonderkommando – May 15, 1944. Two hundred friends who were led to us by German soldiers and murdered – September 18, 1944. Sonderkommando uprising – October 7, 1944. Last day in Birkenau – January 18, 1945.” (pp. 193f.)

This alleged diary was never found, and no witnesses knew anything about it. It had 500 pages for 249 days, so on average two pages were dedicated to each day from 15 May 1944 to 18 January 1945. Gabai, also thanks to it, claimed to remember “exact dates,” but the alleged killing of “two hundred friends” on 18 September 1944 is a fable invented by Filip Müller (who set it generically at the end of September; Müller pp. 152f.); Gabai’s “colleagues,” Henryk Tauber and Szlama Dragon, knew only the rough core of this lore, which they described in mutually contradictory ways and in conflict with the Müller-Gabai narrative (see Mattogno 2021a, p. 50).

Apart from this meager information, the interview with Greif – in spite of the two diary-pages allegedly devoted on average to each day of the witness’s stay at the camp, and in contrast to Gabai’s claim of having an excellent memory – is very sparse as to exact dates and data. Almost certainly, and in any case until proven otherwise, this diary is yet another invention of Gabai.

The interviewer also asked Gabai more-specific questions, which could almost be called “technical” in nature:

“[Greif] How many people went into the gas chamber at one time?

About two thousand people.” (p. 194)

⁶⁰ APMO, Ruch oporu, Vol. XXc. D-RO/123, Inventory No. 106783, p. 21.

In Morgue #1 of Crematorium II (and III), which had a floor area of 210 square meters, this corresponds to a density of 9.5 persons per square meter. While that may be technically possible, if the inmates were cooperative, such a packing density undoubtedly would have made any mechanical ventilation of the “gas chambers” very difficult, because the bodies would have largely obstructed the 40 air-extraction openings located at floor level of the room, 20 on each side. As a result, each time the “gas chamber” were opened, the gas mixture would have spread throughout the basement of the crematorium, as I explain in detail in another study.⁶¹

“[Greif] Can you describe the door?

The door was a thick slab less than two meters high. You could close it hermetically from the outside.” (p. 194)

This description is generic to the point of being utterly banal, unworthy of an “eyewitness.”

“[Greif] How was the gas thrown into the gas chambers?

There were four openings in the ceiling of each gas chamber. In front of all the fixed openings were glass windows protected with iron bars. When the order ‘Throw it in!’ was given, a German would go upstairs and throw the Zyklon B gas down through one of the openings. In the ceiling of the gas chambers there were shower heads – obviously not connected to the water supply – and pipes that were set within a metal grille.” (pp. 194f.)

At the time of the interview, the four alleged openings in the ceiling of the “gas chamber” of Crematoria II-III had long been orthodox dogma, but the details regarding the system of introducing Zyklon B were still uncertain, and the witnesses were divided into two groups, adhering to two different versions: One claimed the presence of wire-mesh columns, described in detail by Michał Kula and accepted as true by the historians of the Auschwitz Museum, and the other version insisted that there were perforated sheet-metal columns. This version was spread by various witnesses, the main ones of whom are, in chronological order:

- Szlama Dragon (26 Feb. 1945): “These false columns were internally empty, and their walls were made of iron plate with perforations, like the common grates that covered the ventilation openings.” (Mattogno 2022b, p. 57)
- Miklós Nyiszli mentioned in 1946 “quadrangular tinsplate pipes, their sides pierced throughout with holes like a grill” (Mattogno 2020b, p. 40).
- Paul (Charles Sigismund) Bendel (1946): “In the middle of the rooms, coming down from the ceiling, two grilled pipes with a valve were used for the emission of gas.”⁶²

⁶¹ Mattogno/Poggi, pp. 95-108, and Docs. 33-39, pp. 133-138.

⁶² Declaration titled “Les crématoires. ‘Le Sonderkommando’,” in: Cassou/Reisz, pp. 159-164, here p. 161.

- This version was imaginatively reprised by Filip Müller in 1979 (Müller 1979, p. 60):

“The Zyklon B gas crystals were inserted through openings into hollow pillars made of sheet metal. They were perforated at regular intervals and inside them a spiral ran from top to bottom in order to ensure as even a distribution of the granular crystals as possible.”

It was also accepted by other witnesses, including Leon Cohen (see Chapter 4). There is also an intermediate version that puts together the two main elements, the pipes and the wire mesh. Kurt Haecker stated on 15 April 1945:⁶³

“This consisted of 3 times each 4 pipes, /with a wire mesh tightly wrapped like a pillar/ which ran vertically from the ceiling to the floor, so that the gas [was] let in above the cellar, sank to the ground, and escaped through the holes into the room.”

Each witness gave his own personal version, imaginatively reworking in his mind the claims he had heard, and so did Gabai, inventing a further variant: the columns were “pipes that were set within a metal grille,” although it is difficult to imagine what that would have looked like.

The presence of “shower heads” is another orthodox dogma, which is a simple misrepresentation of the work carried out in May and June of 1943 “in the basement of Crematorium III” (and only there) for an actual “shower installation,” as shown by various documents that I have published in a specific study.⁶⁴

I will return to the “glass windows” later, in a more-appropriate context.

“[Greif] Who exactly opened the pipes and threw in the gas?”

An SS man. When he threw the gas down, a blue vapor spread through the chamber. The gas came in the form of blue cubes and when they came into contact with the air, the gas was released, causing instant asphyxiation.” (p. 195)

The German text here says, translated (Greif 1995, p. 141):

“The material itself came in blue cubes that dissolved on contact with air, releasing gas that caused immediate asphyxiation.”

In these short sentences, the witness says two huge fibs. One of the carrier materials used to absorb hydrogen cyanide was gypsum cubes, called Ercowürfel. They could have a faint greenish-bluish color (due to the formation of blue-colored iron cyanides resulting from the reaction of rust traces in the gypsum material with hydrogen cyanide). However, precisely because these cubes were made of gypsum (calcium sulfate), it was not possible for them to get “dissolved on contact with air” (which is probably why the translators of the English edition censored that nonsense), and the evaporation of hydrogen cyanide is known to depend on the room’s temperature (and humidity; Rudolf 2020, pp. 236-240).

Gabai also reports the testimonial fable of the blue color of hydrogen-cyanide vapors, artistically depicted by David Olère in a painting showing a “gassing”: The painting depicts several agonized victims engulfed in bluish fumes emanating from a can of Zyklon B (Olère, p. 54). This silliness of blue vapors was probably suggested to many clueless witnesses by the German name for hydrogen cyanide – Blausäure, blue acid – imagining it to be a blue substance that evaporated to produce blue vapors, when in fact it is colorless.⁶⁵

In the immediate post-war period, the bluish color of the Ercowürfel was unknown to almost all witnesses, who unanimously spoke of Zyklon-B “crystals.” This other fable, already told by Rudolf Höss (e.g., in his statement of 5 April 1946: “kristallisierte Blausäure” – “crystallized hydrogen cyanide”),⁶⁶ was regurgitated by Filip Müller (“Zyklon B crystals”; Müller 1979, p. 116).

And here is what Gabai claims happened after the introduction of Zyklon B:

“They were all dead within a few minutes.

After that, a doctor came over and looked through a peephole in the door to watch the people in their death throes and make sure that everyone was dead or whether anyone was still alive. He glanced at his watch, looked through the peephole [German edition, p. 141: window], and watched as death overcame them. [...]

Then a German guard went upstairs and opened the windows. First they opened the vents in the ceiling and then, ten minutes later, they opened the door. After half an hour, it was possible to start work. For half an hour you couldn’t go near the gas chamber.” (p. 195)

This account contains architectural and physiological falsehoods.

Gabai makes a clear distinction between a “peephole” in the door, “vents” in the ceiling, and “windows,” which he places here “upstairs,” hence also in the ceiling. These are the “glass windows protected with iron bars” as quoted earlier. This is Gabai’s invention, which is moreover rather silly, because, if they were “protected with iron bars,” how could they be opened?

Equally silly is the alleged procedure for checking the effects of gassing: why did the doctor, after looking “through a peephole in the door,” have to run onto the roof in order to look down through the (non-existent) “glass window”? (Although that term was quietly replaced by “peephole” in the English edition.)

On the other hand, the witness ignores devices that the orthodoxy insists existed: the four small masonry chimneys closed with a lid that are said to have contained the upper ends of the Zyklon-B introduction columns.

The precise timing of the events is not entirely clear, only their sequence: introduction of Zyklon B – death of the victims “a few minutes” – opening of the “windows” – opening of the “vents” – opening of the door “ten minutes later” – access to the gas chamber after another “half an hour.”

Here the “few minutes” are evidently less than “ten minutes” and can be quantified as 7-8 minutes. For S. Chasan, death took place “[a]fter a few seconds or a few minutes” (see Chapter 3).

Gabai does not say how many kilograms of Zyklon B were used for one gassing, but he speaks of four vents,” so that he adheres to the orthodox standard narrative in this regard, which claims one 1-kg can for each opening, hence four kg of Zyklon B in total.

Germar Rudolf, studying the relevant scientific literature in depth, came to the conclusion that killing the victims within 7-8 minutes would have required about 23-31 kg of Zyklon B (Rudolf 2020, p. 265). But this is only the minor problem, as I will explain momentarily.

If we follow Gabai’s story line, the Sonderkommando men entered the gas chamber just under 50 minutes after the Zyklon B had been poured in (7-8 minutes, plus 10 minutes, plus 30 minutes). Gabai knew nothing of the ventilation system of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II-III.⁶⁷ According to him, ventilation of the gas chamber occurred by opening the non-existent windows, the “vents” and the door. If we follow him, this allegedly allowed workers to enter the room *without gas masks*⁶⁸ after only half an hour! In reality, hydrogen cyanide evaporated from its Ercowürfel carrier material relatively slowly: within the first 7-8 minutes, about 13-15% of its total weight evaporated, about 65% after 50 minutes, and about 74.5% after an hour (Rudolf 2020, pp. 265f.).

A rational organization of the alleged gassings would have required a waiting time of about two hours to let all the hydrogen cyanide evaporate,⁶⁹ followed by an adequate ventilation, and only then would any access to the gas chamber have been possible.

The Zyklon-B introduction column described by Michał Kula and faithfully drawn by G. Rudolf (Rudolf 2020, pp. 152f.) included a device for recovering spent Ercowürfel from the outside. This undoubtedly would have eliminated the initial 2-hour waiting period. However, nothing proves that these columns actually ever existed. In fact, their existence is refuted by the ruins of the concrete roof of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II.⁷⁰ But even if these columns had really existed, it would have made no sense to waste, in round figures, 20 or 30 kg of Zyklon B to kill the intended victims within 7-8 minutes, using just 13-15% of the hydrogen cyanide absorbed on the gypsum cubes. The rest of it, some 85-87%, would have evaporated outside the gas chamber in the open after the deed. This is all-the-more-true because, as Robert J. van Pelt rightly observed, the “bottleneck” of the alleged process of extermination was the cremation of the bodies of the victims, not their murder, so there was no need for brief execution times.

⁶⁷ I accurately describe the structure and operation of this system in Mattoigno/Poggi, pp. 57-69, and Docs. 1-17, pp. 112-118.

⁶⁹ Rudolf 2020, p. 239, with reference to experiments conducted by Irmscher (1942).

“[Greif] What did the bodies look like after they had been gassed?

The corpses that were removed from the gas chamber were smeared all over with urine and blood. [...]

[Greif] Where was the blood from?

From internal hemorrhages that burst in the gas chambers. The gas made blood vessels break open.” (p. 195)

The last sentence is, indeed, bloody nonsense. As G. Rudolf notes (Rudolf 2020, p. 227):

“The effect of hydrogen cyanide is based on the fact that it paralyzes the respiration of every individual cell in the body. Oxygen can no longer be transported from the blood through the cell walls into the cells. As the vital cell functions are thereby starved of oxygen, the animal or human being suffocates.”

Regarding the appearance of corpses of cyanide-poisoning, G. Rudolf notes:

“Symptomatic of hydrogen-cyanide poisoning in fatal cases is the bright-red coloration of the blood and thus also of bruised spots and at times even of the entire skin. This is caused by the over-saturation of the blood with oxygen, resulting in almost all hemoglobin carrying oxygen, forming the so-called oxy-hemoglobin, because the blood can no longer give off its oxygen to the cells.” (Ibid., p. 228)

Ferdinand Flury and Franz Zernik wrote already at the beginning of the 1930s (Flury/Zernik, p. 401):

“The venous blood takes on a bright-red color in hydrogen-cyanide poisoning; this is due to the fact that the oxygen of the arterial blood is no longer absorbed by the tissues, and thus the blood returns to the veins in an arterial state. The bright-red color of death spots, which is observed more frequently after hydrogen-cyanide poisoning, is thought to be explained as postmortem oxidation of the blood due to influx of oxygen.”

⁷⁰ See my study “The Elusive Holes of Death,” in: Rudolf/Mattogno, pp. 291-407.

In other words: hydrogen cyanide leads to no internal bleeding at all. It has no physiological effect other than starving the body's cells of oxygen.

Gabai claimed to have seen many batches of “two thousand bodies” in the gas chamber for many months: “I was there for ten months” (p. 195), although using his accurate memory, he claims a little later that he was part of the Sonderkommando only “[f]rom May 15, 1944, to January 18, 1945 – eight months in all” (p. 205). Either way, he would have seen tens, if not hundreds of thousands of corpses, on whom he observed symptoms that cannot have existed, while he was never struck by the unique “bright-red color” which the skin of hydrogen-cyanide-gassing victims would have exhibited – most-likely because he had never seen even a single one.

This also applies to Sackar, who in this regard stated:

“After a few hours, blood oozed from the bodies.” (p. 112)

“And sometimes the skin had disintegrated from the heat, from the effect of the gas. [...]

Sometimes all the skin on the bodies peeled due to the effect of the gas.

[Greif] What color were the bodies after the gassings?

After the gassings they had a totally natural color, but after the blisters burst they turned red as fire.” (p. 113)

The claims of blood-oozing, blistered bodies whose skin peeled off is utter nonsense, and the color claims are simply wrong.

A while later, Gabai described the cremation process in detail as follows:

[Greif] How long did it take to burn the bodies?

Half an hour. Within half an hour, four bodies were burned in each of the openings of the furnaces. The cremation process worked like this: there were five furnaces, each with three doors – two in the front and one at the back. Five furnaces multiplied by three doors, multiplied by four bodies in each – and you can cremate 60 corpses in Crematorium II [III] in half an hour at one go.... 120 per hour... 2,880 in a day, working round the clock. So it took a full day to work on one transport. Now you can figure the capacity of all four crematoria at Auschwitz-Birkenau.^[71]

For the first fifteen minutes, we rushed around with a pitchfork and turned over the body to get it near the flames. Exactly a quarter of an hour after it was thrown in, it was totally consumed and the next foursome was shoved in. The maximum capacity was four adult bodies or six to eight children.” (p. 196)

He had previously broached this topic as follows:

“I had to load the bodies straight into the furnace with a pitchfork.

⁷¹ The interviewer could not “figure” out anything, because Gabai said nothing about the cremation capacity of Crematoria IV and V, unless he absurdly considered them identical to that of Crematoria II and III, in which case it would have sufficed to multiply 2,880 by 4.

Each furnace had three doors. Four bodies could be put in through each door – sixty bodies in fifteen minutes, and after fifteen minutes you had to stir the whole thing with the pitchfork. The fire blazed and after another fifteen minutes nothing remained of the victims except ashes. Then the work started over. Our work added up to only three minutes – four minutes at the most – and a half-hour break.” (p. 187)

This narrative contains a sequence of absurdities:

1. The description of the triple-muffle furnace is nonsensical: instead of being divided into three muffles (Muffel in German), a term evidently unknown to the witness, he attributes three “doors” to it located “two in the front and one at the back” (instead of “in front,” the German text nonsensically has here “drinnen” = “inside”). The three muffle doors were obviously all located “in front,” while there was none “at the back.”⁷²
2. Within the first 15 minutes of being introduced into the muffle, the four corpses were already in full combustion, so much so that the fire had to be stoked by turning them with a pitchfork. This operation, however, is described by Gabai in relation to only one corpse; in fact, if in some super-human way it had been possible to introduce four corpses into these rather narrow muffles, it would have been difficult not only to turn them over, but also simply to move them a little with a pitchfork. It is a fact, however, that after 15 minutes after the introduction of just one corpse, this body still would have been in the desiccation phase (vaporization of body water).
3. The cremation process was allegedly finished after just 30 minutes, and another load of corpses was immediately introduced into the muffles. In reality, however, the desiccation phase for just one (!) body would have just ended after 30 minutes, and the combustion phase would have started. The cremation process lasted about an hour – again, for just one body.⁷³

Gabai then described the system of loading the muffles:

“at first, four men worked upstairs at the furnaces. After the elevator reached the upper floor, they opened the door and four men pulled out the corpses, sorted them into groups of four, and placed the foursomes at the furnace door. We were divided into two groups with five men in each. The first group carried the stretchers forward to the furnace doors. The second group stood on either side of the stretcher and held the bodies with a pole. There were wheels on the front end of the stretcher.” (p. 196)

Gabai’s task was “to lift up the bodies and place them on the stretcher – head-to-toe with one another.”

⁷² Mattogno/Deana, Part 3, Photos 111-205, pp. 82-131, showing the Topf triple-muffle furnaces as installed at the Buchenwald crematorium.

⁷³ Ibid., Part I, Unit I, Chapter 6 (The Duration of the Cremation Process), pp. 98-109; Unit II, Chapter 8 (The Duration of the Cremation Process in the Topf Furnaces at Auschwitz-Birkenau), pp. 294-314, and related documents.

The corpses were therefore introduced into the muffle two at a time, but the witness immediately afterwards states:

“Within three minutes, all sixty corpses were in the furnaces. Fifteen minutes later, I had to stir the flesh of the bodies with a pitchfork. The smoke reached a height of about seventeen meters.” (p. 196)

Assuming that an average gassing operation encompassed 2,000 victims, as Gabai claimed, and that the elevator had a capacity of “ten corpses (p. 195), four men each would have had to unload 500 bodies from the elevator – the equivalent of $(500 \times 60 \text{ kg}) = 30,000 \text{ kg}$ or 30 metric tons – divide them into groups of four, and drag them in front of each of the 15 muffles. Since 60 corpses were allegedly cremated within 30 minutes, this amounts to $(60/\text{hr} \div 10/\text{load}) = 6$ elevator loads. Hence, the four men theoretically had $(30 \text{ min} \div 6 \text{ loads}) = 5$ minutes to unload, drag and arrange all the corpses of one elevator load, in fact even less, because the witness imagines the simultaneous cremation of the 60 corpses. Therefore, after half an hour, the 60 corpses of the next cremation shift had to be ready in front of the muffles, so the four men had to carry another 60 corpses in front of the furnaces, so to speak, at the beginning and at the end of the half hour of cremation, thus 120 corpses in half an hour, 12 loads; the available time was therefore cut in half: two and a half minutes to handle $(120 \text{ corpses} \times 60 \text{ kg/corpse}) = 7,200 \text{ kg}$ of corpses, or 7.2 metric tons, 1.8 tons each man. An Olympic feat!

Gabai imagines that ten inmates worked at loading the muffles, divided into two groups of five: the first group were the stretcher workers (five inmates for five stretchers, each in front of each of the five furnaces), the second group had to load the stretchers. But with this distribution of labor, Gabai’s statement “Within three minutes, all sixty corpses were in the furnaces” is impossible. In fact, this assumes that there was a stretcher and a loading party of five inmates in front of each muffle, so that 15 stretchers (and 15 inmates assigned to them) and 75 loaders would have been needed, a total of 90 inmates. If, as Gabai says, the time to load a muffle was three minutes, the five loaders would have taken $(3 \text{ min} \times 15) = 45$ minutes to load all 15 muffles. They would have been able to use only one stretcher, and the other four would have remained unused due to lack of loaders.

Earlier the witness had stated: “About twenty men worked upstairs at the furnaces” (p. 195): So what now: 10 or 20? But even if we take 20 for granted, 70 inmate workers would still be missing.

The statement about loading 60 corpses into the muffles within three minutes is doubly absurd, because within three minutes, two successive loads of two corpses each – four corpses within three minutes – would have been introduced into each muffle.

In reality, given the small opening of the muffles (60 cm × 60 cm),⁷⁴ it would have been difficult to introduce even only two corpses,⁷⁵ so the immediate subsequent introduction of four adult corpses (and 60 into five furnaces with three muffles each) would have been physically impossible.⁷⁶

Gabai then piles absurdity onto absurdity, because he claims that “Fifteen minutes later, I had to stir the flesh of the bodies with a pitchfork,” more precisely: “For the first fifteen minutes, we rushed around with a pitchfork and turned over the body to get it near the flames,” or “we turned the bodies over after fifteen minutes” (p. 197). I will dwell on this nonsense later.

In this context Gabai adds an egregious blunder: “There were wheels on the front end of the stretcher.” This assumes that the muffle’s refractory grate was a flat surface on which the wheels could roll (or that it had special guides for wheels). However, this grate consisted of five transverse refractory bars about 9 cm thick and placed about 21 cm apart.⁷⁷ However, the “Rollen” “wheels,” which were called “introduction rollers” or “guide rollers,” were not mounted to the stretcher, but instead, part of a tilting frame that pivoted on a round fastening rod welded to the furnace’s anchorage bars, just beneath the muffle doors.⁷⁸ Hence, they were part of the furnaces, not of the stretcher.

At this point, I return to Gabai’s pitchfork folly that I have left unaddressed. First, it would have been impossible to “turn” four corpses cramp-packed into these small muffles. Secondly, such turning or stirring action would have been utterly pointless, in fact detrimental to the cremation process. When turning a corpse on the muffle grate (from supine to prone position or vice versa), the only thing that changed was the side of the body that was directly exposed to the combustion gases coming from the gas generator. No part of the body got “near[er] the flames,” here meaning the burning combustion gases coming from the gas generator, flowing into the muffle from below through the gaps of the muffle grate, (or in the central muffle, through the inter-muffle openings).

There is no doubt that the chimneys of Crematoria II and III at Birkenau smoked under certain conditions. This was also true for the furnaces of civilian crematoria. In 1945, Hans Keller published an article on this very subject (Keller 1945). But that a column of smoke formed at Birkenau that was 17 meters high (higher than the chimney itself, which was 15.46 meters high) is absolutely implausible.

⁷⁴ The cross section consisted of a 60 cm × 30 cm rectangle topped by a semicircle with a radius of 30 cm.

⁷⁵ See Mattogno 2020, Chapter 12, pp. 101-106, and Docs. 29-36, pp. 258-262.

⁷⁶ It must be kept in mind that the introduction of the corpse into the muffle was carried out at a normal operating temperature of 800°C.

⁷⁸ Ibid., Photos 178-180, pp. 116f.

It is well known that the Birkenau furnaces were fueled with coke, requiring some 28 kg of coke to cremate an average corpse,⁷⁹ but Gabai had other ideas, insisting instead that, once lit, the cremation did not require any additional fuel at all:

“[Greif] How were the furnaces fueled?

Behind the building was a pile of boards that were used to start the fire. Afterwards, the human fat fueled the flames.” (p. 196)

Which begs the question why the corpses in the muffle had to be turned to get them “near[er] the flames,” if the corpses’ fat was the only source of those flames. Needless to say, this is sheer humbug.

No-less-problematic is what Gabai says about the ashes of the cremated bodies:

“After another fifteen minutes, we opened the doors, removed the ashes, and dumped them on the other side. [...] When the corpses were cremated in the furnace, the ashes came out of the other side of the furnace.” (p. 196f.)

The phrase “out of the other side of the furnace” can only mean at the back of the furnace, the side opposite to where the muffle doors were located. However, underneath each muffle there was an ash chamber, and the ash-extraction door was located underneath the muffle door, hence on the same “side.”⁸⁰

Regarding the Sonderkommando, the witness stated:

“About a hundred Sonderkommando prisoners were divided into two groups – at least fifty for the night shift and fifty for the day shift.” (p. 198)

In contrast to this, the series of daily reports “Overview of the Number of Inmates of Concentration Camp Auschwitz II” shows that from at least 28 July until 7 October 1944, the staff of Crematorium II (Kommando 57 B) consisted of 109 inmates working the day shift, and 104 inmates working the night shift.⁸¹

Gabai commits another blunder when describing the housing situation of these inmates inside the crematorium:

“We lived there, on the top floor, in private rooms. [...] and our rooms were upstairs in the loft.” (p. 199)

In Crematoria II-III, the stokers’ dormitory was indeed on the second floor of the building, in the upper floor right under the roof, but rather than consisting of a number of “private rooms,” there was only one large hall, with one little room walled off from the attic hall at one end (above the dissecting room and the elevator), which contained the blowers of the basement ventilation system.⁸²

Gabai claims that, on the day of Yom Kippur, which fell on 4 October 1944, a transport of 2,500 Jews arrived from who-knows-where. They were allegedly all brought to Crematorium II and gassed (pp. 200f.). But Czech does not record the arrival of any Jewish transport on this date (Czech 1990, p. 722).

The witness, transparently manipulated by the interviewer with leading questions, also took up the fable of Eichmann's visit to the Birkenau crematoria:

“[Greif] Do you remember Eichmann's visit?

He came in July 1944. I still remember it as if it were yesterday. At 6:15 in the morning. We already had four bodies inside, half-cremated, not yet totally cremated.”

Gabai continues by claiming that Eichmann ordered two more corpses to be introduced into the muffle, and that the Sonderkommando inmates carried out this order (p. 205).

There is no document mentioning a visit by Eichmann to Auschwitz. When interrogated by Israeli police prior to the Jerusalem Trial against him, Eichmann's replies on this matter were very confused. He first said that Rudolf Höss had told him that there were “new facilities” there that could cremate 10,000 corpses a day. But then he declared that perhaps he had imagined this only, and he had only read or heard about it. He was not sure if he had been to Auschwitz once or twice in 1944, but then remembered that he had not gone to the camp at all, but only to Kattowitz, to Rudolf Mildner, and there they had been joined by Höss. He had visited Auschwitz “during the Hungary Project” (State of Israel, Vol. VII, pp. 371f.). But he did not give any details, and perhaps he had merely imagined this visit as well.

Gabai, on the other hand, had undoubtedly merely conjured up the scene described, as is evidenced by the absurdity of introducing six corpses into a single muffle, moreover by order of a person who had neither competence nor authority inside the Birkenau crematoria, and therefore could not give any operational orders.

Regarding the uprising of the Sonderkommando on 7 October 1944, it is worth noting two points in Gabai's narration, who was then working inside Crematorium III:

“While a battle was raging outside, two Greek Jews came to Crematorium III [IV]: an artillery officer named Rudo and someone named Yitzhak Barsilai.

⁸² See the blueprint of the roof and the attic rooms of Crematorium II, “Entwurf für das Krematorium,” 3 February 1942, in Pressac 1989, p. 362.

There were explosives there and they blew everything into the air. All 750 Sonderkommando men from Crematorium III [IV] were killed [...]

The explosion took place fifteen minutes later. [...]

At six P.M., they brought us the corpses of 850 Sonderkommando prisoners in carts. We had to cremate 750 men from Crematorium III [IV], where the uprising had taken place, and later on they also brought carts with the bodies of the hundred men from Crematorium I [II] who had fled and were captured outside the camp.” (p. 208)

It is well-known that there was no explosion in Crematorium IV; it was not blown up by the inmates, but only set on fire. The number of victims mentioned by Gabai is greatly exaggerated: 850 dead, 750 of which in Crematorium IV, and 100 in Crematorium II. Piper speaks instead of 451 casualties (Piper 2000, p. 187).

With reference to his alleged 500-page diary, Gabai had claimed: “I have a good memory for exact dates; they never slip my mind.” So here are a couple more examples of his precise memories:

On November 1 [1944], we got an order to demolish the crematoria.” (p. 210)

According to Danuta Czech, the respective dates were 2 and 26 November 1944 (Czech 1990, pp. 743, 754).

According to Gabai, the Sonderkommando consisted of 100 inmates in Crematorium II, just as many in Crematorium III, and 750 in Crematoria IV and V, who were apparently housed in Crematorium IV. The survivors were therefore the 100 inmates of Crematorium III. On 1 November 1944, these 100 inmates received “an order to demolish the crematoria,” a task that they performed together with an unspecified number of inmates until 18 January 1945. F. Piper, on the other hand, states that the SS made a selection among the 212 Sonderkommando survivors on 26 November 1944, as a result of which 30 inmates were assigned to Crematorium V, 70 to the demolition squad for the demolition of Crematoria II and III, and 100 were killed not far from the camp (Piper 2000, pp. 187f.). Gabai knew nothing of this, although he claims to have been one of these men.

But why were the Sonderkommando survivors not killed as dangerous “carriers of secrets”? Here is Gabai’s answer:

“No one really knows why. Evidently it’s because we’d mingled with the rest of the prisoners and no one could tell us apart anymore. Then tremendous chaos broke out and the SS men couldn’t guard us properly.” (p. 210)

Since, according to the witness, he and the group of survivors worked on the demolition of the crematoria until the morning of 18 January, it would not have been difficult for the SS, if they had really wanted to kill them, to have picked them up at their place of work a day or two earlier. This is a typical explanation that projects the stupidity of the witnesses onto the SS.

Gabai had already written down a statement in Jerusalem on 20 June 1983 at the initiative of Erich Kulka, who then drafted a German-language report, whose title translates to “Statement about the work in the Sonderkommando in Auschwitz-Birkenau.”⁸³ This essay contains several contradictions to Gabai’s statements made during Greif’s interview. I point out the main ones.

He stated that he had been deported from Greece on 11 April 1944 and that “after a 10-day journey in inhuman conditions, without any food, [we] arrived on 21 April 1944 in the Polish territory occupied by the Germans, at AUSCHWITZ Station.” (p. 1)

Upon arriving at the camp, approximately “800 strong men” were selected and lodged in the Quarantine Camp BIIa, Block 12 (p. 1). He told Greif that “[t]he trip took ten days, from April 1 to April 11, 1944.” (Greif 2005, p. 184) and that 700 had been selected.

They underwent another selection on 12 May, “after a month” (p. 1), but he told Greif that this happened “[t]wenty days after we’d come” (Greif 2005, p. 185).

Assignment to work at the crematoria (referred to here as 2-5 = II-V) took place as follows:

“On May 15, we were escorted to the four crematoria in Birkenau, divided into four groups and accompanied by the SS: 50 each for Crematoria No. 2 and 3, and 100 each for Crematoria No. 4, 5, and for the gassing bunker and incineration pits near these crematoria.” (p. 1)

Therefore, there were not only “incineration pits” near both Crematoria IV and V (rather than only behind Crematorium V, as the orthodoxy claims), but also a “gassing bunker”!

The witness was assigned “to work in Crematorium No. 3” (p. 2), but he told Greif that “we were taken to Crematorium I [II]” (Greif 2005, p. 186).

Gabai stated that Crematorium III was staffed by 100 inmates, who were lodged in the attic and worked in two 12-hour shifts. He was sent to work in the “incineration room where 10 prisoners divided into groups of 5 burned the bodies of the gassed Jews in the furnaces.” The “incineration room” was equipped “with 5 blocks of three furnaces each, in total 15 incineration furnaces,” in each of which four adult corpses were loaded (six “if children corpses were burned”) and “the cremation of these 4 bodies took about 30 minutes,” so that the facility’s capacity was as follows:

⁸³ “Aussage über die Arbeit im Sonderkommando in Auschwitz-Birkenau.” YVA, O.33-1904; subsequent page numbers from there, unless stated otherwise and until the end of this chapter.

“In 15 furnaces (4 in each) about 120 corpses were cremated per hour, in 2 shifts of about 20 working hours about 2,400 corpses were cremated in this crematorium.” (p. 2)

He told Greif: “120 per hour... 2,880 in a day” (Greif 2005, p. 196).

The “undressing room” contained “more than 2,000 persons.” The “gas chamber” named “bath room” also contained 2,000 people. Gabai described it thus:

“In the ceiling were masked rosettes of showers, and the ceiling was supported by support columns. Three columns among them were perforated, hollow, protected by a grid. These three columns opened through the ceiling and through an earth embankment into a pipe about 1 m high, with a gas-tight closure. In this pipe, when the gas chamber was full of people, the SS disinfectors, protected by a gas mask, poured in the crystalline, bluish gas Zyklon B from cans. The door of the gas chamber was screwed shut, and the SS doctor watched the dying through the peephole in the door. When the people were dead, about 10 minutes later, he gave a signal, and the disinfectors opened the lids on the pipes and vented the gas chamber. The warm poisoned air flushed out through the columns. In addition, the gas chamber was also vented by fans. Only after about 50 minutes after this venting, the doors of the gas chamber were opened, and the prisoners entered – without masks – and pulled out the corpses from the gas chamber.” (p. 3)

Here Gabai reworked the scant literary information he had at his disposal with his own imagination. He adopted Kurt Haecker’s version of the perforated sheet-metal columns, which had a wire mesh around the perforated tube, but he inexplicably mentioned only three columns instead of four. These columns extended above the roof of the “gas chamber” “into a pipe about 1 m high,” like the tube of a stove. But the outside chimneys, if they ever existed, had to be made of brick, because they had to support heavy concrete lids, if we believe Henryk Tauber.⁸⁴

A few additional remarks are necessary in this connection. During his interrogation of 11 June 1945, Michał Kula expounded a detailed description of an alleged Zyklon-B introduction column,⁸⁵ which was faithfully drawn by Germar Rudolf (Rudolf 2020, pp. 152f.). The height of the device was 3 meters, which makes no sense, because the ceiling of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II-III was only 241 cm high, and the concrete roof was 18 cm thick,⁸⁶ so that the column protruded above the roof by (300 cm – 241 cm – 18 cm =) 41 cm. This part of the device was completely unnecessary, and only a demented person would have designed it this way. A column of (241 cm + 18 cm =) 259 cm, lowered from above, would have been set firmly into the roof opening, and it would have been sufficient to bolt it to the floor to ensure its solidity. Above the roof, around the opening, a brick chimney of adequate height would have been built in order to keep the surrounding sand/soil from falling into this column.⁸⁷ However, Szlama Dragon stated that on the roof of the “gas chamber” “stood a low square chimney, about 30 cm high, which was covered by a layer of felt and a heavy removable concrete lid,”⁸⁸ so Kula’s column, which was 300 cm high, had to protrude some 10 cm beyond the chimney: 241 cm + 18 cm + 30 cm = 289 cm.

From this perspective, the height of Gabai’s pipe would make sense, but the total height would be (241 cm + 18 cm + 100 cm =) 359 cm. In practice, the devices described by Gabai contradict those of the official narrative in number, structure and size.

The witness adds further fantasies: these portentous “columns” served not only to introduce Zyklon B, but also for the venting of the “gas chamber,” since “the disinfectors opened the lids on the pipes and vented the gas chamber. The warm poisoned air flushed out through the columns.” Gabai had a vague knowledge of the official thesis, so he stated, “In addition, the gas chamber was also vented by fans.” It is clear that he knew nothing about these “fans,” but the main problem is another: since “columns” and “fans” only provided the air extraction (“entlüftet” in the German original),” how was fresh air ducted into the room? Not by the door, because this was opened only at the end, “after about 50 minutes after this venting.”

I have already dwelt earlier on the fable of Zyklon B as “crystalline, bluish gas.” Gabai spiced this up with another folly (p. 4):

“Gas, as I said, there were bluish-colored crystals about 1-2 cm in size; they have evaporated completely, no remnants of it I saw on the floor.”

So the calcium-sulfate cubes underwent a sublimation process and simply disappeared!

According to Gabai, the last gassing in Crematorium III took place on 31 October 1944:

“I remember it exactly. There were 400 Muselmänner (completely exhausted, sick prisoners); among them were my two cousins: Leon Venezia and Baruch Venezia, both from Saloniki; they came with the same transport.”

Gabai personally accompanied these inmates to the gas chamber (p. 3).

This alleged gassing is unknown to Danuta Czech (Czech 1990, p. 742), and the reference to the Venezia brothers is moreover a contradiction of what Gabai told Greif:

⁸⁷ According to Plan 933[-934] of 19 January 1942, a 45 cm layer of sand was to be placed on the roof; Pressac 1989, p. 279

⁸⁸ Statement by Szlama Dragon to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on 27-28 February 1945. GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 24.

“Apart from me, the brothers Leon and Baruch Venezia, both of them from Salonika, worked in Crematorium II.” (Greif 2005, p. 202)

So they too were Sonderkommando members; but if that was so, then how could they end up in a group of 400 “Muselmänner”?

Gabai told the story of the alleged preliminary selection of the 200 Sonderkommando inmates by dating it to “roughly early September” of 1944 (but Piper claims “at the end of September”; Piper 2000, p. 186)

Gabai told Greif generically “In September 1944” (Greif 2005, p. 207). This is not irrelevant, because the official motivation for the selection (as explained by F. Piper) was the decrease in transports that occurred later, as I noted earlier (after the arrival of the 60,000-70,000 Jews from the Łódź Ghetto).

In his account of the Sonderkommando uprising of 7 October 1944, which he gave to Greif, Gabai described the beginning of the events as follows (Greif 2005, p. 208):

“The day the great uprising began, they ordered the Sonderkommando to cut back on the work because there were no more transports. They ordered some of us to go to the Sauna. Those of us in Crematorium II [III] decided not to leave the area because we knew we were done for if we did.”

But to E. Kulka, Gabai had reported a different story:

“About 10 o’clock in the morning, the alarm was sounded and we – 100 prisoners from Crematorium No. 3 – were chased away by the SS man to our quarters in the attic.”

Later, “around noon,” these detainees were escorted to Crematorium II and led “to the basement, where there were about 600 corpses in front of the gas chamber, which we had to burn. They were corpses from the last transport. Later, towards evening, 100 corpses of our comrades from Crematorium No. 2 were brought to the crematorium yard by truck. We had to undress these corpses, which had bled to death – the men had been shot – and burn them as well.” (p. 5)

As quoted before, during the Greif interview, Gabai did not mention the 600 corpses already present in the basement, greatly increased the number of Sonderkommando inmates killed that day, and has them brought in on carts (Greif 2005, p. 208):

“At six P.M., they brought us the corpses of 850 Sonderkommando prisoners in carts. We had to cremate 750 men from Crematorium III [IV], where the uprising had taken place, and later on they also brought carts with the bodies of the hundred men from Crematorium I [II] who had fled and were captured outside the camp.”

According to this version, 850 inmates of the Sonderkommando were killed during the uprising of 7 October 1944, but Gabai contradicts himself on this point as well, because he states that on that occasion that “some 400 prisoners were shot who took part in the uprising – of Crematorium No. 2 and IV [sic]” (p. 4), and, in further contradiction to this, “all those who somehow took part in the uprising were shot by the SS, according to my estimate there were about 500 Sonderkommando prisoners of Crematoria Nos. 2 and 4” (p. 5).

Kulka’s transcript of his interview with Gabai also contains a reference to the “bunker” on three lines (p. 6):

“During the time of the Hungarian transports, I also worked a few days at the bunker, where the corpses were burned in pits. The corpses were dragged from the gas chambers directly to the cremation pits.”

It is clear that he knew nothing about this, and introduced the subject only to recount far-fetched atrocity tales about Otto Moll (on the subsequent eleven lines).

Gabai expanded on other alleged atrocities of Moll. The narrative covering 15 lines begins as follows:

“It was probably in August 1944 when a transport of 250 Muselmänner was brought to the crematorium. They were not Muselmänner from the Auschwitz Camp, but from a subcamp. Since it was a small transport, Moll decided not to gas them; he will ‘finish off’ this transport himself.”

This is said to have happened in the “antechamber” of Crematorium III, “in front of the freight elevator” (p. 7).

This transport is purely fictitious, and the story is at odds with the purported division of the “gas chambers” into two rooms, precisely in order to exterminate smaller transports “economically”; it is worth recalling Sackar’s related statement (Greif 2005, p. 110):

“There was one room that could be divided into two. When a small transport came – two hundred, three hundred, or five hundred people [...]”

The 250 “Muselmänner” were all killed by Moll “one by one” with a gunshot to the head, but something stunning happened on that occasion (p. 7):

“When Moll started shooting, two of the Muselmänner got up and asked Moll to allow them to sing and dance before shooting them. Moll agreed. One of the Muselmänner sang a waltz ‘An der schönen blauen Donau’ (‘At the beautiful blue Danube’), and the other danced, until he was led to Moll to be shot about half an hour later.”

If one considers the situation (“Muselmänner” who could not even stand upright and were about to be killed), the tale is grotesque. Gabai repeated this fib to Greif with not insignificant variations. The transport arrived at Auschwitz “in August 1944,” came “from several camps on the outskirts of Auschwitz,” and consisted of “250 Polish Muselmänner.” Moll ordered that they were not to be gassed (Greif 2005, p. 192):

“He wanted to butcher them personally. First he beat them with the metal rod that he used to shatter the remaining bones of people who had died. Afterwards, he came down and asked one of the soldiers to give him a rifle and some bullets. He began to shoot. After he shot four or five of them, one of the Muselmänner called out, ‘Commander!’ and Moll, who was a brutal sadist, answered, ‘Yes?’

‘I’ve got a request.’

‘What do you want?’

‘As you shoot my friends, I want to sing the Blue Danube waltz.’

‘Be my guest! How jolly! It’s even better to shoot with musical accompaniment,’ Moll answered. So the man sang – la-la-la – and Moll shot them all until it was the singer’s turn. The last bullet hit him and finished him off.”

The differences between the two narratives are obvious; it is only worth noting that Gabai found a way to contradict himself on the “metal rod” as well, because he told E. Kulka:

“The unburned bone remains were smashed with hammers by a group of prisoners.” (p. 7)

With or without variations, such an account can only come from a sick mind.

In this earlier interview with Kulka, Gabai clarified the circumstances of his miraculous “survival”:

“When our work ended on 18 January – there were only 100 Sonderkommando inmates left in the camp – we met about 3000 prisoners in Camp Sector BIId who were preparing for the evacuation march. The camp commandant ordered that the Sonderkommando inmates not be allowed to leave the camp. We were locked up in the block and waited. Around 5 o’clock in the afternoon came orders: All prisoners must leave the camp. We entered the food warehouse and took bread, margarine, canned meat and other things for ourselves, and also some blankets. We left Birkenau and were led to the Auschwitz I Main Camp, where we waited until midnight.”

If this narrative has any logic, the 100 Sonderkommando inmates had to remain in Birkenau in order to be exterminated there as “carriers of secrets,” and precisely for this reason they were “locked up in the block,” but then, they miraculously got out and even found a way to provision themselves at the food warehouse.

After a three-day march, the inmates were loaded “into open railway cars and brought by train transport to the Mauthausen Concentration Camp; it was in January 1945” (p. 6).

At Mauthausen, no one was looking for the inmates of the Auschwitz Sonderkommando, and thus the “miracle” was completed.

3. Shaul Chasan

I already introduced this witness earlier, so I will start out from his release from the Quarantine Camp:

“[Greif] How were people chosen for the Sonderkommando?

The Germans simply visited the ‘quarantine’ and picked out 250 strong men for labor. We didn’t know what we’d been chosen for until we began to work. We began to march to work with another 200 men.” (p. 264)

This apparently took place on the very day the prisoners were taken from the Quarantine Camp, thus on 12 May 1944. The witness describes his first day of work as follows:

“We looked around, and what did we see? A little rustic house, a cottage all by itself. We went in, and when they opened the door we could hardly believe our eyes. The whole interior of the house was filled with bodies from a transport, more than a thousand corpses. The whole room was filled with bodies. I remember them picking out six or seven men – I was one of them [...]. We had to remove the bodies. There was a pool there, a deep pit, called a ‘bunker.’

We had to pile the bodies on top of each other like sardines. Other workers split logs and we did everything in sequence – wood, corpses, wood, corpses, corpses, corpses, until the whole pit was filled. A barrel of gasoline stood there; it had been prepared beforehand. The SS man who was in charge poured the gasoline, pulled out a hand gun, and fired a few rounds to set the gasoline on fire. You couldn’t use a match. The fire took hold and corpses, corpses, corpses, corpses, throw ‘em in, throw ‘em in, burn ‘em, burn ‘em, burn ‘em.” (p. 264)

Also for Chasan, “Bunker 2” was “a deep pit,” not the “rustic house” or “cottage” or “little house that was used as a gas chamber” (p. 265), which evidently had only one door and one chamber, while “Bunker 2” is said to have had four doors and four rooms (Piper 2000, p. 139).

Chasan states that the Sonderkommando working at the “bunker” consisted of “[a]bout three hundred men in all, I think” (p. 265), but he says nothing about the division of tasks, except that “six or seven men,” among them Chasan, were designated to extract 1,000 corpses from the “cottage.” This means that, in the most-favorable case (seven men), each inmate had to drag out over 140 corpses.

In his deposition to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on 26 February 1945, Szlama Dragon had described the division of tasks among the Sonderkommando members in detail as follows:

- 12 inmates (among them Dragon) removed the bodies from the gas chambers
- 10 inmates carried the corpses to the carts
- 30 inmates loaded the corpses onto the carts
- 20 inmates threw the corpses into the pits
- 28 inmates carried wood to the pits
- 2 inmates removed gold teeth, rings, etc. from the corpses
- 2 inmates cut the hair of the corpses

The total is 104 inmates, including as many as 40 in charge of the alleged carts, which in any case were not used in 1944 (according to Chasan, the pit was located at a distance of only a “few meters, maybe thirty meters” from the “cottage” (p. 265).

Szlama Dragon stated moreover that in 1942-1943 “Gas Chamber No. 1” was equipped with four cremation pits measuring 30-35 m × 7-8 m × 2 m, with a capacity of 7,000-8,000 bodies per day. Gas Chamber No. 2, on the other hand, allegedly had six pits, with a capacity of 10,000 bodies per day.⁸⁹

So if 104 inmates were sufficient to gas and cremate 10,000 people per day, why did “Bunker 2,” which was equipped with only one cremation pit, require 300 inmates in 1944? This is even more incredible since, in order to dispose of the bodies of 1,000 gassing victims, these 300 inmates had to work “twenty-four hours straight! (p. 264).

To the interviewer’s question “Where was the pool that you mentioned a few minutes ago?” (the “deep pit”), the witness answered:

“The pond was also called a ‘bunker.’ Just now, when I returned to Auschwitz, I didn’t find the pit or the cottage. It must have been behind Crematorium IV [V].” (pp. 264f.)

Such a statement would be completely inconceivable for a true eyewitness. As mentioned earlier, the small house that was later named “Bunker 2” was located about 250 meters west of the Zentralsauna, and in May 1944 the area between the Zentralsauna and the location of “Bunker 2” was completely open, as is shown by U.S. air photos of 31 May 1944 (Mattogno 2016, Docs. 9, 9a, 9b, pp. 244f.), and even in the early 1990s, despite new vegetation, the Zentralsauna was still clearly distinguishable from the ruins of the former house (ibid., Docs. 4, p. 242). On the other hand, seen from this vantage point (and from any vantage point in the pentagonal area of the alleged “Bunker 2”), Crematorium V was completely concealed already in 1944 by the dense thicket to the west of Crematorium V. Such an egregious “error” therefore clearly betrays a gross lie. This is confirmed by the fact that at the time, according to Chasan, the Sonderkommando was housed in Block 11 or 13 of Birkenau (p. 265), in Camp Sector BIId. In order to go to the “cottage” from there, one had to first reach the camp's main road (the one that ran along the "ramp" with three railroad tracks), follow it to the end, passing between Crematoria II and III, and exit the camp through a gate that was next to the four sewage sedimentation pits, less than 100 meters from the Zentralsauna, either follow a straight little road which then turned 90° to the right, or a path through a forested area (the Waldweg), which led directly to the "cottage" (and formed with the other two road sections the base of a scalene triangle). It is therefore impossible to claim that the "bunker" was located "behind Crematorium IV [V]."

At the specific request of the interviewer, Chasan provided the following description:

"It [The pit] was very deep, I think about four meters deep. The bodies were thrown in from above. We stood in a group and placed them up on top of each other. We went into the pit with a ladder. After we filled the pit, they dumped the gasoline onto the bodies and the SS man fired a bullet and started the fire. The fire burned day and night, and it was our job to throw the bodies in, non-stop." (p. 265)

As for the burning, given Germany's gasoline shortage especially from 1943 onwards (Mattogno/Kues/Graf, pp. 1276-1278), one cannot believe that Auschwitz wasted a "barrel of gasoline" (p. 264) at every claimed mass cremation in the open air.⁹⁰ The system of lighting the pyre, "a bullet" (!) instead of a few rags soaked in a flammable liquid, is worthy of a Hollywood director.

The pit, according to Chasan, was about four meters deep. But at the time, the groundwater table in the area of the "bunker" was on average about 1.2 meters below the ground surface. In this area, which did not have any drainage system, the situation was identical to that of Construction Sector III, about which the head of the Central Construction Office, SS Obersturmführer Werner Jothann remarked on the occasion of refusing permission to occupy 14 barracks located there:⁹¹

"Barracks are only partly roofed, area is swampy and not leveled in any way. A contamination of the groundwater and the formation of further sources of disease is feared."

Chasan's "pit" would therefore have filled with groundwater to more than 2/3 of its depth.

The witness adds further nonsense by asserting that the "fire burned day and night." In fact, as early as 15 December 1943, the camp commandant had communicated in Garrison Order 55/43 (Frei et al., p. 380):

⁹¹ RGVA, 502-1-83, p. 2; see my paper "'Cremation Pits' and Groundwater Levels at Birkenau," in Mattogno 2016a, pp. 119-127.

“After tightened air-protection measures have been implemented for the Auschwitz area, immediate total blackout is hereby ordered.”

The setup of the pyres consisted of arranging alternating layers of wood and corpses in the pit, pouring “a barrel of gasoline” on top, and setting the whole thing on fire. Chasan then introduces an absurd variation: “it was our job to throw the bodies in, non-stop,” meaning that Sonderkommando inmates had to throw corpses onto the already-burning pyre. It is clear that, without special catapults, the task would have been impossible, because the very high temperature of the fire would not have allowed any person to get close enough to the edge of the pit in order to throw in a corpse.

The witness then returns to the wood used for the fire:

Here the witness speaks of trees, thus, presumably fresh wood. For Jean-Claude Pressac and van Pelt, the average weight of a corpse at Auschwitz was 60 kg (Pressac 1989, p. 475; van Pelt, pp. 470, 472). But setting up a pyre for 1,000 60-kg corpses would have required about 320 tons of green wood (or about 170 tons of dry wood).⁹² Where did this wood come from? The interviewer was not interested in this question, and the interviewee evidently even less-interested in providing an explanation.

Chasan again draws on a black propaganda anecdote by telling far-fetched and nonsensical stories:

“Once I saw a woman who was left behind, outside, with a little baby. The gas chamber filled up, the doors were locked, and the woman and the kid remained outside.”

Of course, both were shot “in cold blood” (p. 266). Chasan claims that this happened at the “bunker”; he had already forgotten that in his description of the “cottage” he had mentioned only a single door.

The other anecdote is another solemn idiocy:

“One evening, after the corpses had been cremated, a truckload of old, sick, and disabled people came by with clothing and other things, and they dumped everything out of the truck as if it were a load of gravel, straight into the pit while the people were still alive! I saw this twice – once on my first day of work with the Sonderkommando and again, when other transports came. The people were thrown into the ‘bunker’ and burned alive.” (p. 266)

The origin of this fable can be identified with sufficient accuracy in the black propaganda invented and disseminated by the various Auschwitz resistance organizations. In a “Description of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp” dated

July 10, 1943, it is stated that up to September 1942, 468,000 Jews had been deported to Auschwitz, and another 181,000 up to the beginning of July 1943 (a total of 649,000!), and that 98% of all (or of the 181,000 mentioned above – the text does not specify) were gassed, “mostly completely healthy young people and were burned half alive [nawpół żywcem].”⁹³

A little over a month later, the victims were burned alive, and, to make the script more gruesome, children were introduced:

The “Review of the Most-Important Events in the Country. Monthly Communication of 27 August 1943” stated (“Obóz koncentracyjny...,” p. 120):

“The bodies of 11,000 Bolshevik prisoners murdered during the winter of this year were disinterred in the Birkenau Subcamp. The bodies have been burned. 5,000 bodies per day are burned in the crematorium, while the rest, since there are more [than 5,000 a day], are burned alive in the ‘eternal flame’ in the open air at Birkenau – the children are thrown into the fire while still alive.”

An “Annex No. 61 for the Period between 1 and 30 November 1943” states:⁹⁴

“During the gassing of 30,000 Jews from Zagłębie Dąbrowskie, the crematoria were unsuccessful in burning the bodies, so they were burned on pyres, the children were thrown alive into the flames.”

The examples given are more than sufficient.⁹⁵ This fable found a judicial “confirmation” during the Höss Trial, which took place in Warsaw from March 11 to 29, 1947. Already during the second hearing (12 March 1947), Prosecutor Tadeusz Cyprian asked the defendant, Rudolf Höss:⁹⁶

“Does the defendant know that at the camp the children were thrown into the fire?”

Defendant [Höss]: No.

Prosecutor: On this circumstance, High Court, please call two witnesses, Marian Nowak, from the village of Szpinek near Zamość, and Jan Klein from Zamość, Okres Street No. 5a, who brought children to the camp by trucks, and by means of the mobile [tiltable] cargo bed, the children were tipped alive directly into the fire.”

These two witnesses were not summoned, but others told the court this tale. Wanda Kuzela testified during the eighth hearing (on 19 March 1947):⁹⁷

“Then, after the Warsaw Uprising, 7,000 children were brought and arrived one night in Auschwitz at the bathing facility. At 2 o’clock, these children were picked up and taken to the pit [do dołu], where the children were burned.

Höss, Tauber and others were present. The children were grabbed by the legs and thrown from the truck into the fire. The children were screaming. I saw this with my own eyes, I was working in the fields. There were two pits, they were concealed by green shrubs. The children were thrown from the truck by the legs into these pits with fires.”

During the same hearing, Stefan Wolny claimed that during the deportation of the Hungarian Jews he saw “Höss grab a child and throw it into the pit.”⁹⁸

During the eleventh hearing (22 March 1947), Hermann Langbein, the future historian of the Auschwitz Camp, took the stand. He attempted to rationalize this propaganda fable, which previously had been attributed to SS sadism that had been exaggerated to the point of being preposterous:⁹⁹

“In the course of these poisonings and gassings, when Cyklon-B gas was no longer available in sufficient quantities, Höss gave the order that from then on gassings should be performed using less Cyklon-B gas, as a result of which some people, after the gassing, only lost consciousness, and were handed over alive to the crematorium. I also know that Höss, due to the lack of gas, ordered to set up pyres near the crematoria, and to burn the children alive there, i.e. without prior gassing. He ordered the formation of a special Kommando of prisoners who were to throw into the flames these children, and among them also their own children.”

One version of this fable, namely the one according to which the SS threw the children into the burning pit by taking them by the legs from a truck, was “scripted” by David Olère in a 1947 color painting, which he first sketched out as a black-and-white drawing (Olère, p. 40; see Doc. 3). These paintings bear the caption “SS throwing live children into a burning pit (Bunker 2/V).” The picture shows the rear of a truck at the edge of a burning “cremation pit”; the truck’s loadbed, full of children, is tilted towards the pit, and from it, an SS soldier, standing at the edge of the pit, grabs the children and throws them into the fire; while another SS man, also standing at the pit’s edge, makes the Hitler salute. In this context, it is important to keep in mind that the thermal decomposition of a human body begins at some 400-500°C, and the combustion temperature of the less-flammable gases is about 650-700°C, so this should be considered the minimum temperature of a pyre or “cremation pit.”

In reality, then, the two soldiers, due to the heat radiating from the blaze, would have been burned alive, while the truck’s fuel tank would have exploded within minutes. This applies, all-the-more-so, to the method of unloading the children by tipping the cargo bed, because in this case the truck would have had to move even-closer to the edge of the pit.

⁹⁸ Ibid., p. 900.

⁹⁹ Ibid., pp. 1206f.

Incredibly, this absurd tale was elevated to the status of a “historical” event by the Auschwitz Museum. In her essay “Children and Adolescents in Auschwitz,” Helena Kubica wrote (Kubica, p. 279):

“Many prisoners, especially members of the Sonderkommando who were assigned to burn corpses in the crematoria, witnessed how people – including children – were killed at the edges of the pits used for burning corpses near Birkenau crematoria. Many also witnessed terrifying scenes when children were flung alive into the burning pits. Feliks Rosenthal was one of the few men from the Sonderkommando who survived. He once saw a truck pull up outside Crematorium V. It was loaded with infants wrapped in paper swaddling. SS men shot at them while they were being tossed down from the truck. “Not all of them were killed. Many were only wounded. These children were burned, some of them still half-alive, on the burning pyres [...]”

Another “eyewitness,” Jan Szpalerski, stated the following (ibid.):

“I saw [...] how, in the region of the pits [where the corpses were burned – HK (Helena Kubica)] near Crematorium IV, three trucks drove up one after the other – dump trucks loaded with living children. These trucks backed to the edge of the pit and tipped their beds so that children in them fell right into the fire [...]”

The fact that the Auschwitz Museum endorses such nonsense shows how little interest they have in historical veracity.

After this necessary elaboration, I return to Chasan’s statements:

“Eventually the Germans figured out that cremating the corpses in pits, as they did in Birkenau, wasn’t an appropriate solution. What’s more, winter was coming fast, so they couldn’t carry on that way. That’s why they began to incinerate the people in crematoria. They assigned us to work in the crematorium. I went to Crematorium II [III] and stayed there until the end.” (p. 267)

Here the witness reverses the sequence of the orthodox narrative, according to which the “cremation pits” were introduced because the capacity of the crematoria was insufficient to cremate all the bodies of the gassing victims. For Chasan, however, the crematoria were used because the “cremation pits” were inefficient!

In his more-detailed descriptions, the witness mentioned only one “undressing room” and one door of the gas chamber, but sometimes he forgot and spoke of them in the plural: “The undressing rooms and the gas chambers were in the basement” (p. 267); “[...] and they were taken to the gas chamber. After the doors were closed [...],” (p. 268). However, regarding the single door, Chasan stated: “A heavy door made of iron.” (p. 271).

Here instead is how Franciszek Piper described the door (Piper 2000, p. 165):

“The door measured 192 cm. by 100 cm. and was made of two layers of boards with an insulating plate between them. The edges of the door and the door frame were lined with felt.”

At the request of the interviewer, Chasan gave an extensive description of Crematorium III:

“The gas chamber at Crematorium II [III] was underground. It had gray walls and a gray ceiling. The floor was concrete. The chamber was large enough for a transport of twenty-five hundred people if not more. The transports were always led into the gas chamber in one go. They pushed everyone in. They looked like shower rooms. They had a ventilation system that created a flow of air. There were showerheads in the ceiling, next to each other. The whole ceiling was full of showerheads. They were for ‘disinfection,’ the people were told. Everyone who entered the chamber really thought he was going to take a shower. But not a drop of water came out of those showerheads. The people were packed in until the gas chamber was full. The door was locked after everyone was inside.” (p. 270)

For Chasan, the density of people in the “gas chamber” was thus ($2,500 \div 210 \text{ m}^2 =$) about 12 per square meter.

The problem is that the alleged “undressing room,” a term actually referring to Morgue #2 of Crematoria II and III at Birkenau, measured $49.49 \text{ m} \times 7.93 \text{ m}$ (Pressac 1989, p. 286), so it had a surface area of 392.5 m^2 . This would have resulted in a density of six persons per square meter. However, according to the orthodox Holocaust narrative, there were also benches in the room for sitting down. This thesis, well-illustrated in a drawing by David Olère,¹⁰⁰ was also accepted by Chasan, who stated:

“The undressing room was underground; it had benches and hangers. Everyone who’d arrived was told they had to hang up the clothes and remember where they’d hung them.” (p. 267)

Therefore, the space available in the alleged “undressing room” was even less: how could six people standing together on less than one square meter get undressed?

This account also contradicts the one presented by Josef Sackar. With reference to the “undressing hall,” he stated:

“The room wasn’t large enough for a thousand people to undress all at once.” (p. 96)

The deportees entered it in groups (“only some of them each time,” p. 97), but he does not say how many people made up each group. The room measured “some 50 meters by 8 meters,”¹⁰¹ “There were benches on both sides of the room and there were hooks on the walls where the people hung their things” (p. 99), and: “The benches ran the full length of the room, that is, everyone had room to sit down while they undressed” (ibid.).

¹⁰⁰ Olère, p. 52, Drawing from 1946 titled “In the undressing room of Crematorium III.” Olère drew seven women and five children in it!

¹⁰¹ Greif 1995, p. 18; the English translation erroneously states here “At least fifty to eighty meters,” p. 99.

So if there were a maximum of 100 meters of benches (2 rows of 50 meters along the two longest walls), assuming a space of 0.5 meters per person to sit, the benches would have contained 200 people, and the groups of deportees who entered the room from time to time must have been around that number. Sackar, however, also says that

“The whole business, leading two thousand people to the gas chamber,^[102] took about an hour, no more. That’s how long it took to put them in the gas chamber.” (p. 97)

Therefore, each group of 200 people had six minutes to enter the “undressing hall,” undress, and then pass into the alleged gas chambers, but when asked “How long did it take the people to undress?” the witness replied, “About half an hour, sometimes a whole hour, between fifteen hundred and two thousand people!” (p. 98).

Then Sackar contradicts the statement that everyone had sufficient room on the benches to undress by introducing an illogical variant:

Yes, sitting down and also standing up. If there was enough room, they undressed sitting down. If not, they undressed standing up.” (p. 100)

But the fact that there was “enough room” was only guaranteed by the division of the deportees into groups, which depended on the fact that there was not “enough room” for 1,000 people in that hall.

Returning to Chasan’s testimony, he makes another statement that is untenable even from the orthodox perspective: “The whole ceiling was full of showerheads.” In this regard, the orthodox thesis was devised by Jean-Claude Pressac. In the handover protocol for Crematorium III dated 24 June 1943,¹⁰³ with which that building was handed over from the Central Construction Office to the camp administration, Pressac found the “criminal trace” of “14 showers” attributed to Morgue #1. Pressac concluded (1989, p. 429):

“In fact only 14 were planned and we know that they were FITTED, because seven wooden bases to which similar shower heads were fitted are still visible in the ruins of the ceiling of L[eichen]-keller 1 of Krema II.”

Pressac opines that these were “dummy showers” distributed in two rows of seven on either side of the central ceiling beam. As I pointed out in another study, Pressac’s explanation is a banal paralogism, because he claims to prove the presence of fake showers in Morgue #1 of Crematorium III (Three) on the basis of wooden bases present only in Morgue #1 of Crematorium II (Two). The fact is, however, that the wooden bases are indeed present in Crematorium II, but not the alleged fake shower heads, while the fake showers are allegedly attested to for Crematorium III, but not the wooden bases.

Moreover, during an inspection in June 1990, I found eight wooden bases (including the empty recesses in the reinforced concrete that originally contained them) in Morgue #1 of Crematorium II, which I photographed repeatedly on my subsequent visits (see Rudolf/Mattogno, Photos 9f., p. 405). They are arranged in the ceiling in two parallel rows to the right and left of the central beam, at a distance of about 1.65 meters from the beam and about 1.90 meters from each other. Sizes vary slightly (10 cm × 11 cm; 9 cm × 12 cm), while their thickness is about 4 cm. The individual pairs of wooden bases (or hollow recesses in the concrete) are placed offset from the pillars, lengthwise along the Morgue. They simply served as bases to which the lamps of Morgue #1 were attached, as I document in another book (Mattogno 2019a, pp. 140f.). The reinforced-concrete roof of Morgue #1 was supported by a beam of 0.40 m × 0.40 m, supported by seven pillars of the same cross section. They divided the seven-meter-wide room into two parts, each 3.30 meters wide. At the center of each part was a wooden base, according to the following measurements (starting from the outer sides of the room): |wall – 1.65 m – wooden base – 1.65 m – beam (0.40m) – 1.65 m – wooden base – 1.65 m – wall| = 7 meters. Since there were lamps in that basement room, and because no other objects existed to attach them to, this confirms on the one hand that the wooden bases must have been used indeed to attach the lamps to the ceiling. On the other hand, they could not have any relation to fake shower heads, because only a demented person would have placed merely 14 fake shower heads on an area of 210 square meters to “fool” 2,000 victims, with each shower head covering an area of 3.30 m × 1.90 m (= 6.27 m²), after having granted to the alleged victims less than one square meter for six people to undress in the “undressing room”!

Regarding the system of introducing Zyklon B into the alleged gas chamber, Chasan also called the openings into which these introduction columns were mounted “windows” (p. 271):

“There were several openings. A latticework shaft came down from each opening. The mesh was made of perforated metal; it ran from the window in the ceiling to the floor. And the gas, in the form of little pellets, was thrown down the hollow shaft. The smell spread. That was the gas.

[Greif] Did the shaft reach the floor?

Almost. A small space was left so that you could clean there. We poured water on the floor and swept up what remained of the pellets. We always poured water there;”

I remind the reader that for Gabai the Zyklon-B “crystals” evaporated and disappeared.

Here is how Franciszek Piper describes the alleged Zyklon-B introduction columns (Piper 2000, p. 166):

“They were shaped like vertical rectangular pillars, 70 cm wide and about 3 m high, made of two layers of wire mesh with a sliding core section. The bottoms of the pillars were set into the floor and the tops poked out through the roof, resembling chimneys capped with lids having two handles”

Leaving aside the “window” (a theme developed with vibrant imagination by Jaacov Gabai), Chasan mentions a “latticework shaft [...] made of perforated metal,” whereas it must have been a square column of wire mesh. Since he calls the ventilation system’s air-intake cover “metal cover with openings,”¹⁰⁴ the “latticework shaft” suggests precisely a large, perforated metal tube, in accordance with the version I have described earlier.

The witness also knew nothing of the “sliding core section,” which is said to have served to recover the Zyklon-B gypsum pellets from above. According to Chasan, the pellets were swept up from underneath, because there was sufficient space between the lower edge of the column and the floor – which, by the way, meant that the Zyklon B fell directly onto the floor of the room. But this recovery could only have taken place after all the corpses around the “latticework shaft” had been cleared, which would have taken many hours. Since the removal of the corpses took at least 12 hours (see below), and the evaporation of all the hydrogen cyanide from the gypsum pellets took about two hours at 15°C, low relative humidity and fine distribution according to Richard Irmischer (Rudolf 2020, pp. 236-239).

Sackar had elaborated on this same fable, and unwisely added his own details:

“Inside the gas chamber there were also four pillars with cages around them, and into them they threw the gas pellets. [...]”

They were square pillars with mesh around them. Not concrete pillars but mesh ones. They had a lid on the top. The Germans opened the lid and tossed in the gas in the form of pellets, green pellets of gas.

[Greif] Were the four pillars made of iron?

Of iron, of metal, metal mesh. They weren’t concrete pillars. They were angular pillars made of mesh – not of concrete. They had holes in them.

[Greif] How large was the opening through which they threw the gas into the chamber?

At least thirty-five square centimeters.” (p. 110)

¹⁰⁴ See further below. In the German edition, in both cases the term “Durchlässe” is used; 1995, p. 237.

This description goes back to the version of wire-mesh columns. According to the Kula version, however, the columns had to be 70 cm × 70 cm, not 35 cm × 35 cm,¹⁰⁵ although Kula later reduced the size of these columns down to only 24 cm × 24 cm (see Rudolf 2020, pp. 148-158).

Chasan mentioned “ventilation” several times; here is his most-accurate description:

“The ventilation was installed in the walls. You wouldn’t notice it; all you could feel was the chill. You could hardly hear it. There was a metal cover with openings and cold air came in almost the entire length of the wall. The ventilation worked all the time; it was turned off only when the gas was thrown in. The Germans did a very effective job of camouflage. They considered it supremely important to maintain a mantle of secrecy until the last moment. Perfect deception.” (pp. 271f.)

I describe the ventilation system of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III in detail in another study.¹⁰⁶ Here it suffices to say that the ventilation system consisted of an air-intake and an air-extraction duct, connected to two blowers with a capacity of 4,800 m³/hr of air. In Morgue #1, the air-intake blower supplied fresh air through two ducts, which ran along the two corners where the longitudinal walls met the ceiling. They were closed by slanted planks, which, in cross section, formed the hypotenuse of a right triangle. This conduit ran the entire length of the room and was provided with 20 air-intake openings on each side, at a height of about 215 cm from the floor. From these openings, which were protected by a perforated sheet-metal cover to prevent insects sucked in by the blower from entering the room (a morgue, after all), the fresh air entered the room (see photos of these devices in Pressac 1989, pp. 233, 487). Chasan knew nothing of the air-extraction duct, without which the ventilation system could not have functioned. The air-extraction ducts were walled up behind the side walls of the room at the bottom, and were connected to the room by 40 openings, 20 on each side, arranged almost at floor level. Stale air was sucked out through these openings, which were protected by iron-bar grates (see Pressac’s drawing, ibid., p. 234).

Chasan claims that the ventilation (in his perspective: only air-intake) was in operation while the alleged victims entered the room, according to him for the purpose of “deception,” and “[a]fter the door was closed, the ventilation was turned off.” (p. 270).

Shortly afterwards he explained:

“The Germans knew exactly how to design the gas chamber with maximum efficiency. Even if they’d left the people there for a whole hour without gas, everyone would have suffocated. It was enough to close the door. The room was hermetically sealed. The walls were made of concrete; there was no way for fresh air to come in, nothing. The ventilation system made it possible to enter the chamber without risk of choking.” (p. 271)

¹⁰⁵ The German original here states “35 Zentimeter im Viereck” (Greif 1995, p. 33), meaning “35 cm squared,” hence 35 cm × 35 cm, not 35 cm², which would only amount to ca. 6 cm × 6 cm.

¹⁰⁶ Mattoigno/Poggi, pp. 57-93 (Ventilation system of Crematorium II/III, blower capacity of Morgue #1, increase in blower power, motor power and blower capacity, Blower No. 450 planned for Crematoria IV and V).

This raises the question why the SS, despite allegedly having a cheap, fast and efficient suffocation chamber that worked even without the use of any toxic substance, should have risked using Zyklon B to kill the victims, which might have been faster than letting them simply suffocate (but since the “bottleneck” of the alleged killing process was cremation, as van Pelt correctly observed, a prolonged execution time wouldn’t have been an issue), but the use of Zyklon B was also much-more-dangerous and added the complication of a prolonged and difficult ventilation of the alleged gas chamber, as even Chasan stated. He repeatedly described the alleged gassing and the subsequent opening of the door of the room. Zyklon B was introduced into the room from above through an unspecified number of “windows”:

“After a few seconds or a few minutes – our brains weren’t working very well because of what was happening there – everyone was dead. As soon as they’d they [sic] died, the door was opened and we had to run for our lives. Sometimes there were still residues of toxic gas there and we might have choked if we’d inhaled it.” (p. 271)

“The door was opened after the SS men checked to make sure that everyone was really dead. But you couldn’t go near then, because there was still active gas in the air. It endangered the lives of anyone who stood there. The door was opened, the SS man backed away, and then the ventilators were turned on and the door stayed open for half an hour. The gas wafted away and we could begin to work.” (p. 272)

“Half an hour after the gas chamber door was opened and the ventilation was turned on, we began to work. We opened the windows in the ceiling and began to remove the bodies.” (p. 273)

“[Greif] Did you ever think that you couldn’t carry on? Did you ever want to die?

Yes, it happened. A friend and I wanted to inhale gas the moment the door to death opened. [...] but in the end, we went out, lay down, and inhaled. That way, we were able to continue breathing.” (pp. 279f.)

To summarize, the procedure was as follows: the victims died within a few minutes of the introduction of Zyklon B; as soon as they were dead, an SS man opened the door, then the ventilation was turned on, and simultaneously or later the “windows” in the ceiling were opened. All these operations were carried out without gas masks, and for this very reason they were very dangerous and required particular caution.

In fact, opening the door under such conditions would have been suicide, because any air-intake without an air-extraction would have led to the toxic hydrogen-cyanide vapors getting pushed through the door into the vestibule and the rest of the building, fatally affecting all bystanders.

In his description of the corpses, Chasan resorts to another testimonial folly:

“I saw the corpses, dead people standing like statues.” (p. 272)

A clear echo of Filip Müller’s fantasy,¹⁰⁷ which he in turn had taken from the “Gerstein Report.”¹⁰⁸

To the interviewer’s question, “How long did it take to remove twenty-five [hundred]¹⁰⁹ bodies from the gas chamber?,” Chasan replied, “Twelve hours, maybe even longer” (p. 274). According to the German edition, removal was done by grabbing a corpse by the throat with a “walking cane” (1995, p. 241), as has been claimed by numerous other witnesses, but according to the English edition, the inmates used “a long pole, a pitchfork,” to grab the bodies “by the loose skin and tug” (p. 273). Dragging a body with a pitchfork would have been possible only by ramming the fork deep into the corpse, then dragging it somehow, which would have been a preposterously difficult task. The translator probably got his wires crossed here.

From the alleged gas chamber, the corpses were dragged to the elevator, which had a capacity of “six to eight bodies” (p. 274). If one considers an average load of seven corpses, the elevator had to make 357 upward trips and as many downward trips in a time of about twelve hours, so the entire operation (loading seven corpses, upward trip, unloading the corpses, downward trip) had to take place within $([12 \text{ hr} \times 60 \text{ min/hr}] \div 357 \text{ trips} =)$ about two minutes!

Morgue #1 – the alleged gas chamber – was 30 meters long, so half of the alleged 2,500 victims – 1,250 – were located within 15 to 30 meters of the door, which was, moreover, only one meter wide (Piper 2000, p. 165), so that the corpse transporters had to pass through it one by one.

Under these circumstances, the time available for the entire sequence of operations – 2 minutes – is completely unrealistic.

Chasan said practically nothing about the crematoria; on the cremation process, he merely reinterpreted the clichés of orthodox Holocaust propaganda:

“We washed the bodies before cremating them. Cremation took place day and night. There, on the furnace floor, they developed a system: they put skinny bodies together with a fat body because fat speeded up the cremation process. It was harder with skinny bodies; the fire refused to burn. This is how they cremated bodies all the time – we removed the bodies from the gas chamber and they were cremated upstairs.” (p. 274)

¹⁰⁷ The corpses stood on their feet “like columns of basalt.” Müller 1979, p. 117.

¹⁰⁸ “Wie Basaltsäulen stehen die Toten aufrecht.” Gerstein’s Report as published by Rothfels (p. 191).

¹⁰⁹ 2,500 in the German original (Greif 1995, p. 241).

“Corpses were removed from the gas chamber around the clock. They were cremated upstairs and every two or three days we removed the bones from the furnaces. We dealt with this on days when no transports arrived.” (pp. 274f.)

The witness does not clarify where and how the washing of each corpse took place “before cremating them,” thus, most likely, in the furnace room; but a washing had already taken place before the removal of the corpses from the gas chamber:

“We poured water on the floor and swept up what remained of the pellets. We always poured water there; that made it easier to drag and pull the corpses along the floor and to clean up the feces and the filth left by the victims.” (p. 271)

The “system” of cremation reported by the witness (“they put skinny bodies together with a fat body”) is inefficient and also ridiculous, because, in the witness’s imagination, it assumes that the “fat” body would catch fire immediately, and its flames would burn the “skinny” body. In fact, the simultaneous introduction of two corpses into a muffle designed for only one would have altered and impaired the cremation process, causing the muffle to cool excessively in the initial phase when the bodies’ water evaporates, making in difficulty to cremate the desiccated bodies in the later, exothermic phase. It should be remembered that the less-flammable gases produced during the thermal decomposition of the body have an ignition temperature of 650-700°C, so that no cremation takes place at lower temperatures, but only carbonization (char-coaling).

Cremation was carried out “day and night,” but Chasan does not say how many corpses were cremated in the course of a day. We may assume that this number was at least as high as the gas chamber’s capacity, which was 2,500 people (whose corpses were removed in about 12 hours). However, the witness states that “over a two-week period” “ten or twenty thousand people” had arrived at Crematorium III (p. 275), which amounts to an average of 714 to 1,428 per day, and he adds that “[a]fter a month” the number of victims was 40,000 (ibid.), which means on average just over 1,300 per day. If, therefore, a normal transport contained 2,500 victims, during this month (Chasan does not indicate which one, but the period is the summer of 1944) 16 transports arrived at Crematorium III in 16 days, and none on the remaining 14 days. A situation entirely incommensurable with the orthodox version of claimed extermination during the summer of 1944 (Piper 1994, p. 174):

“Thus in the summer of 1944, the combined [daily] capacity of all the incineration installations reached the staggering number of 20,000 victims.”

According to the witness, the cremation remains, “bones” (actually only ashes and small bone fragments fell into the ash chamber during the cremation), were taken out of the furnace “every two or three days.” But the “Operating instructions for the coke-fired Topf double-muffle incineration furnace” prescribed in this regard (Mattogno/Deana, Part 2, Doc. 227, p. 383):

“As soon as the corpse parts have dropped from the fireclay grate onto the inclined ash plate below, they must be moved forward towards the ash-removal door by means of the scraper. These parts may remain here for another 20 minutes for post-combustion. Then the ash is transferred into the ash container and set aside for cooling.”

Hence, there was no need to wait with the removal of bone fragments and ashes for an operational gap between transports, but it could be done at any given time. However, every day the furnaces had to be shut down in order to clear the hearth grates of coke cinders, but Chasan evidently knew nothing of that.

Chasan then unleashes his imagination by inventing an utterly outrageous historical anecdote:

“One day the Mufti came. He was right next to me. The Kapo said that it was the Mufti. This was in August 1944. He wore a strange hat. He came to watch the cremations. Maybe he thought about doing something similar in Palestine. The Germans explained to him how the murder mechanism at the crematoria worked.” (p. 277)

Here it is necessary to quote Greif’s incredible comment in an endnote:

“The ‘Mufti’ mentioned here is not the mufti of Jerusalem, Hajj Amin al-Husseini, but his nephew, Mussa Abdalla al-Husseini, who visited Auschwitz in 1944 accompanied by a German called Grobe. In 1951, the latter al-Husseini was responsible for the assassination of King Abdullah of Jordan. He was hanged in Amman. Author Jennie Lebel of Ramat Aviv gave me this information, for which I thank her.” (Note 18, p. 374)

In this fanciful endnote, the Dr. Grobe’s name is misspelled, which was certainly Dr. Fritz Grobba, the foremost German envoy to the Middle East. In order to cover the lie of his witness, Greif was therefore willing to invent the most-incredible stories. No document and no other testimony confirms this alleged visit. The only “confirmation” (which, however, would concern the Grand Mufti himself, not his nephew) is the story of a certain Ernst Verduin, evidently from an interview conducted in 2012. Hence, for all we know, Verduin might have been inspired by Chasan’s tall tale. It is such an absurd story that it deserves to be quoted as an example of mendacious impudence of self-proclaimed witnesses (Vermaat 2012):

“It was a very hot day in June or July 1944 when I was at work in Monowitz, also known as Auschwitz III. And then I suddenly noticed a group of people who looked like actors. They were wearing long robes and strange headgear. Occasionally, internees did perform a play in the camp. I wanted to find out myself and as I walked towards that group I was stopped by a high ranking SS-officer whom I didn’t know. He was from the main camp (Auschwitz I) or Birkenau (Auschwitz II). The officer asked me, ‘What do you want?’ ‘I just wanted to know whether these people are actors or not. Is there going to be a stage performance tonight?’ ‘These people aren’t actors,’ the SS-officer told me. ‘They are the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem and his retinue.’ I then asked him, ‘What is he doing here?’ ‘He is paying a visit to the camp,’ the SS-officer said. ‘He lives in Berlin where he enjoys Hitler’s personal protection. He is now paying a visit to Monowitz to see how the Jews are working themselves to death in factories. He is also in Auschwitz to see the gas chambers. When we have won the war he will return to Palestine to build gas chambers and kill the Jews who are living over there.’”

All that was missing was that the “high ranking SS-officer” invited the Jewish prisoner Verduin to drink tea at the Führerheim!

Returning to Chasan, he narrated the story of the Sonderkommando uprising of 7 October 1944, and concluded:

“The uprising was poorly organized, nothing worked, everyone was murdered. We – the Sonderkommando men of Crematoria II [III] and IV [V]} – were the only survivors.

We continued to work and when it was almost all over, in November 1944, we blew up the crematorium at the Germans’ command. [...]

We began with Crematorium II [III]. Afterwards we went to I and finally to III [IV] and IV [V].” (p. 281)

But Crematorium III [= IV] had burned down during the uprising. The witness made no mention of the alleged “end of gassing” order, and the interviewer did not ask him anything about this.

Chasan finally recounted the events that led to his survival: “They began to evacuate Birkenau in December 1944.” The survivors of the Sonderkommando were housed in “an isolated barracks,” and Chasan claims to have known for what purpose:

“They wanted to execute us in order to destroy all the evidence.” (ibid.)

In that case, this “isolated barracks” would also have been guarded by armed SS men, but instead, fortunately, the unexpected happened:

“We saw how all the people were coming out of the barracks for the ‘evacuation’ and were marching away. We fled from the barracks and blended in with the crowd. We began to march with everyone else. We thought we’d survive that way.” (ibid.)

The affair ends with the usual (alleged) stupidity of the SS:

“When we reached Mauthausen, two guards from Crematorium I [II] were searching for us and asking everywhere, ‘Who worked in the Sonderkommando?’ In the meantime, we’d lost weight because we’d been marching for several days and had hardly eaten anything. So they couldn’t tell us from the others. What’s more, we wore our caps in a way that no one could recognize us. They searched and searched and didn’t find us. They chased us all the way the Mauthausen[sic]! Imagine, to the last moment they searched for us so they could murder us.” (ibid.)

4. Leon Cohen

In addition to the statements made to Greif, as mentioned earlier, the witness followed up with a memoir that contains a rather crude fanciful anecdote: From Greece to Birkenau: The Crematoria Workers' Uprising. Although it was published only a few years later, it has several differences from the interview, which I highlight by citing the respective texts. It should be pointed out immediately that in the book Cohen incomprehensibly calls the SS guards of the camp "Shupos" (SchuPo, Schutzpolizei; patrolling police), while they were in fact part of the SS Totenkopfbataillon, organized into various guard units (Wachkompanien; Lanik, p. 296).

The witness believed that he had arrived at Auschwitz "in late November [1943]" (p. 292), where he was assigned Registration Number 182492 (p. 293), which, however, was assigned on 11 April 1944 (Czech 1990, p. 609). His transport was met by Dr. Mengele:

"He was a young man, in his thirties. Next to him stood a woman, evidently his main assistant, and two enormous German shepherd dogs." (p. 264)

In the book, Cohen could not resist the urge to develop this point in his story in a decidedly ridiculous way:¹¹⁰

"At his side, a very beautiful woman was leading two huge Alsatian dogs. This woman was reputed to be a nymphomaniac. She picked strong muscular men for one-night stands and when she had completely exhausted them, she killed them with her own hands and used their skin for lampshades or bookbindings. I sometimes wonder, is this madness, could it really have happened? To make it worse, at the Nuremberg trials, which was a complete farce, she only received a prison sentence and even managed a quick release as she was pregnant. Thanks to some legal quirk, she is now enjoying total freedom. Why was she not subjected to the very laws she and her friends had enforced in Auschwitz, where pregnant women were immediately dispatched to the crematorium? Or am I talking nonsense?"

He committed a huge blunder in this narrative, because the woman in question was none other than Ilse Koch, wife of SS Standartenführer Otto Karl Koch, who was commandant of Buchenwald Camp until September 1941, a camp in which Ilse served as supervisor. She is known in orthodox Holocaust literature as the "Witch of Buchenwald," especially for the fable of the tattooed human-skin lampshades, allegedly made of skin from prisoners who had been killed for their skin.¹¹¹ Ilse Koch had nothing to do with Auschwitz and was never an “assistant” of Dr. Mengele. Moreover, Cohen misrepresented the true story of Ilse Koch, stating that “thanks to some legal quirk, she is now [= 1996] enjoying total freedom”: she was in fact arrested by the Americans in 1945, sentenced to a life-term imprisonment in 1947, amnestied by the Americans in 1947, re-arrested by the German authorities and in 1951 again sentenced to a life-long prison term; she died by suicide in prison in 1967 (Gutman et al., Vol. II, pp. 775f.).

Cohen’s transport was subjected to a “selection” – he does not specify where, presumably at the “old ramp,” and “We were taken to Birkenau that very day” (p. 293). According to his book, however, he was taken directly to Auschwitz: “In this state of mind, we reached the gates of Auschwitz, which bore the gigantic inscription ‘Arbeit macht frei’” (p. 19), and only then was he sent to Birkenau. Here he was housed in a “quarantine block,” whose number he could not remember.

“We spent a month in the quarantine barracks. One day, a German visited the barracks with a Jewish doctor who was to ‘examine’ the prisoners.” (p. 293)

“After three weeks in quarantine, we were screened for trained workers for the different commando units.” (p. 29)

The account given to Greif continues as follows:

“A few days later a young German [...] came over. [...] The next day he approached me [...]. Then he told me that he needed two hundred strong to do loading work at the train station, I told him that the Greek Jews in the barracks, about two hundred men in all, could do the work.” (p. 293)

In his book, Cohen wrote:

“For three days, we anxiously waited. [...] The following day, at ten in the morning, our Kapo ordered me to recruit six men and to transport a whole load of old rubbish and useless objects to the crematorium and never to agree to work in the Sonder. [...] Fortunately, we hadn’t far to go and reached the courtyard of Crematorium 2 in half an hour.” (pp. 29f.)

This anecdote does not appear in the interview. In his book, the young German is a Kapo, who said:

“‘I am setting up a team,’ he said, ‘to lay a railway line which will extend for a few kilometres. I need strong, sturdy men who can work overtime. [...] I need about a hundred and fifty men.’ I immediately thought of all my Greek comrades in misery, of whom there were about a hundred and sixty in the block.” (pp. 33f.)

¹¹¹ Defense lawyer Rudolf Aschenauer wrote in this regard: “The propaganda claim about human skin has not been substantiated in any trial, not even in the U.S. and German trials against Ilse Koch. It is nothing more than outdated propaganda.” Aschenauer, p. 38.

Cohen states that “[it] was exactly a month” after the quarantine had begun, meaning on 12 May 1944, as pointed out earlier, 150 Greek inmates were chosen and assigned to the four crematoria (p. 294).

“The next morning [13 May 1944], we walked to the camp. The Germans didn’t take us to the cremation facilities but rather to the cremation pits. I saw several wagons next to the pits, and nearby was a building with a small gate. Later on, I found out that people were being gassed to death there. I waited outside for about half an hour and then we were ordered to open the doors. The bodies fell out in one great mass and we began to load them onto the wagons. They were small open wagons, the kind that you find in coal mines, much smaller than railroad cars. We took the corpses to the pits. A layer of women’s and children’s corpses was placed in the pits, and on top of them was a layer of wood. Then a layer of men’s corpses was put in, and so on, until the pit – which was at least three meters deep – was filled. Then the Germans poured gasoline into the pit. A bright flame rose from the mixture of bodies and wood.” (p. 295)

In this context, Cohen never mentions the term “bunker.” The description of the related “facility,” whose location relative to the camp he does not indicate, is extremely general: it had “a small gate” and “doors,” and that is all. He also speaks of “cremation pits,” but does not say how many there were, what size they were and where they were located. The only data he gives, the depth of “at least three meters deep,” is false, because, as I noted above, the groundwater table was on average about 1.2 meters below the ground surface, so the pit would have filled two meters deep with water. The system of operation of these “cremation pits,” on the other hand, is demented: at the bottom they arranged a “layer of women’s and children’s corpses” and “on top of them was a layer of wood,” as if these corpses burned better than wood!

The witness also saw “several wagons” (but it is not known how many) to transport the corpses. But according to the orthodox narrative, these, were only used during the first phase of activity of “Bunker 2,” meaning during 1942-1943, but not in the second phase of 1944. I have already pointed out that Franciszek Piper covers “Bunker 2” only superficially on just six lines, in which he says only that this facility was reactivated in May 1944, was operational until the fall, and was equipped with who-knows-how-many “cremation pits” and “undressing barracks.” Dov Paisikovic was the witness who provided the most-detailed description of this alleged extermination facility, accompanied by drawings.¹¹² He claims to have been taken to work at “Bunker V” on the 21st of May (eight days later than Cohen), but he did not see “wagons”

there at all, because he claimed that the system of transporting corpses was completely different:¹¹³

“We were severely beaten, and an SS man ordered us: ‘One man drags one corpse.’ Since we did not know how to carry out this order, we were beaten again, and then the SS man showed us that we had to grab the corpse with the curvature of a stick by the neck, and pull it over.”

There is no need to point out that in the air photos of Birkenau taken on 31 May 1944 (and all subsequent ones), no trace of any field railway nor of “wagons” appears in the area of the alleged “Bunker 2.”

In his book, Cohen returned to this theme, devoting a special chapter to “The Bunkers” (p. 46.):

“This ends my detailed account of the work in the Crematoria. In the bunkers, however, things operated differently. A bunker was a ditch five meters deep, but its width gradually narrowed from about six meters to one meter. It was filled to the top with alternating rows of fir or pine branches and of corpses. Once full, the ditch was soaked with petrol and set on fire. To accelerate the process of cremation, Sonderkommando men stood on either side of the ditch and tended the fire with long poles. It usually took two days and two nights to complete the work at each ditch. When the fire had died out from lack of burning material, the ditch had to be cleared of the remaining debris, such as half-burnt branches and accumulated fat. Only then would the cycle start again with the next group of prisoners, who soon arrived.”

Here again, this witness foolishly equates the “bunkers” with “cremation pits.” Its shape was rather odd: at an impossible depth of five meters (some four of which would have been filled with groundwater), its surface area was wedge-shaped for no perceivable reason. In the Greif Interview, the bottom of the pit was only three meters deep.

I have already commented earlier on the claimed use of gasoline for the “cremation pits.” With regard to the cremation process itself, the witness makes a new statement: “Sonderkommando men stood on either side of the ditch and tended the fire with long poles.” At a burning temperature of 650-700°C, this would have been impossible, because the men at the edge of the ditch would have been fatally burned. The entire procedure in one pit lasted “two days and two nights,” an unusually long time (for F. Müller, cremation lasted either one day or 5-6 hours; Mattogno 2021a, pp. 120, 126); however, no open-air cremation activity was possible at night, because as already mentioned, Garrison Order No. 55 of 15 December 1943 had ordered “immediate total blackout” in the Auschwitz area (Frei et al., p. 380). That fat could have accumulated at the bottom of a cremation pit is even-more-ridiculous than the often-claimed recovery of fat during cremation.

¹¹³ I have quoted and critically examined Paisikovic’s various testimonies in Mattogno 2021a, pp. 135-160; quoted text from p. 136.

The witness then states that “our contingent force now reached 1125 men, a number unheard of since the beginnings of the Sonderkommando” (p. 47), but the maximum number attested to by documents, as mentioned earlier, is 903 men, including skilled workers.

Cohen regurgitates the worst black propaganda that would have put to shame even a hardened liar like Miklós Nyiszli, such as this one about SS Hauptscharführer Otto Moll:

“The commander of the new group of Shupos was a syphilitic Sergeant called Molle [sic]. This vile creature never dared set foot in the crematoria but he thoroughly enjoyed the incinerations in the bunkers. Apart from sexually abusing any girl who took his fancy, he also amused himself by ordering groups of five naked girls to line up in front of each other next to the blazing bunker. He then fired a single bullet because, he said, he was trying to find out if it was possible to kill five people with one shot. Needless to say, although these unfortunate creatures were only wounded, they fell into the flames and died a horrible death. When this was eventually reported to our Kapo he was absolutely incensed. To his credit, he made a point of immediately contacting the Auschwitz headquarters and that disgusting animal, that syphilitic monster was transferred to another camp. This was the last we ever heard of him. Maybe he ended up on the Eastern front.” (p. 47)

While this is merely a grotesque anecdote, the narrative that follows, which has historical pretensions, borders on dementia:

“The bunkers worked uninterrupted, especially when up to three or four convoys were arriving daily. The ‘showers’ and the crematoria could not cope. Here, there were no frills, none of this ‘undressing to have a bath’. These people who had been condemned to death for the sole crime of being born Jewish or of having a Jewish grandfather were first showered with blows and then kicked into cattle trucks. The trucks were permanently parked in the centre of the fields, about three hundred meters from the ditches. Up to a hundred people were crammed inside, and half an hour after the doors were shut, gas was forced in through a small opening which was later closed. Listening to those unfortunate people howling and knocking at the walls was unbearable. It all lasted ten to fifteen minutes and then suddenly it would become terribly quiet. A quarter of an hour later we opened the rear of the trucks and loaded the corpses onto special wagons which we pushed along temporary rails to the ditches. When we got there, we overturned the carts and tipped the corpses out into the ditches, then hurried back to repeat the task over and over again.” (pp. 47f.)

This basically means that imaginary “gas vans” were stationed and employed at the “bunkers”! This poor fool attributed to Birkenau what orthodox Holocaust historiography ascribes to Chełmno.

Not satisfied with this tomfoolery, the witness adds another idiocy, namely that “the bunkers and the crematorium had been operating for ten months” (p.

48), meaning from May 1944 to January 1945! Since the “bunkers” are “cremation pits” for this witness, it should be pointed out that their activity ceased at the end of August 1944 according to Danuta Czech, hence after just three and a half months of activity (Czech 1990, p. 700, entry for 30 August 1944):

“The pits in which the corpses of gassing victims were burned when the crematoriums could not keep up are now covered over in order to destroy the evidence.”

Cohen does not specify how long he worked at the “bunkers.” He only says that “later” he was assigned to Crematorium III, where he stayed for three days, then he was transferred to Crematorium II, where he stayed until January 1945 (p. 295). Having worked there for so long, he must have had a good knowledge of these mirror-image structures, but his description in the Greif Interview is extremely terse: “It was a very long building” (p. 295). In his book, however, he expands on the subject (p. 38):

“I should now explain to the reader how the crematoria and the bunkers worked. Corpses were normally burnt in the crematoria, but if too many prisoners arrived at the same time, it became impossible to pack them [all] in and the task had to be performed in the bunkers. I will later explain in detail how this was done. There were four very up-to-date crematoria. They were numbered 1 to 4 and stood in two parts of the buildings [camp]. Number 1 stood in front of number 2 and likewise number 3 faced number 4, 250 meters apart.”

It is unclear how Cohen arrived at this distance. It is a fact that the Birkenau Camp was about 1,660 meters wide, and the road distance between the most-distant crematoria (Nos. II and V) was less than 1 km. Another fanciful measurement is that of the crematoria chimneys, which according to him were 40 meters high (“The forty meter high chimneys...”; p. 99), but the chimneys of Crematoria II-III were only 15.46 meters high,¹¹⁴ and those of Crematoria IV and V were only a tiny bit higher: 16 meters.¹¹⁵

“The whole setting was very uniform except that crematoria 3 and 4 were in the centre of the camp, while the first two were on its very edge. Each crematorium had its own basement, ground floor and upper floor. The basement was reached through twelve steps, four meters wide. The steps led straight into a 250 square meter hall (approximately twenty by twelve meter).” (pp. 38f.)

Therefore, according to the witness, Crematoria IV and V also had “basement, ground floor and upper floor,” but every apt Auschwitz historian knows that they were simple ground-floor buildings with neither a basement nor any upper floor. This means that Cohen never set foot in them, and probably never spoke to an inmate who worked there.

To this day, the ruins of Morgue #2 in Crematorium III have a staircase with eight steps, about 2 meters wide, not 12 steps, four meters wide. The room, as mentioned earlier, was rectangular, 49.49 meters long and 7.93 meters wide (= 392.5 m²), which is a far cry from the claimed room of “approximately twenty by twelve meter.”

If we follow the Greif Interview, however, the room in question was “more than fifty meters long and six meters wide” (p. 295), which is pretty close to the real size and corresponds to at least 300 m².

The witness confirmed in his book that “wooden benches provided seating accom[m]odation along each wall and numbered clothes hooks thirty centimeters apart, had been fixed above these benches” (p. 39), which, as I have already noted, reduced the space for undressing. In this regard Cohen stated during the Greif Interview:

“In the basement were the undressing hall and, behind it, the gas chamber, which looked like a shower room in every respect. To get to the undressing hall, you had to go down fifteen steps.” (p. 267)

And here is the related description in his book:

“When people reached the basement, they were told that the aim of the exercise was to give them a bath, to disinfect them and their clothes. They would go into the shower-room, in which the only thing visible was a fictitious nozzle affixed to the ceiling. Everyone had to strip naked. Women and children went in first (for purposes of so-called modesty) and the men followed. The door to another hall (the ‘transit’ room) of sixteen square meters in size was opened when everyone was ready. It led from the shower to the gas chamber.” (p. 39)

Hence, for Cohen, it was not the “gas chamber” that resembled a “shower-room,” but the “undressing hall”! In addition, the “fifteen steps” of the interview turned into 12 in his book (but there were actually only eight).

At its end, Morgue #2 actually narrowed into a corridor 1.97 meters wide and 5.30 meters long. At the end of this corridor was a double-leaf door measuring 2.10 m × 1.80 m, which gave access to the vestibule, where on one side the corpse chute with its staircase was located, and on the other side the freight elevator, next to which was the door to Morgue #1, the alleged “gas chamber.”¹¹⁶

Cohen completely ignored the vestibule. The related numerical data given by him are also contradictory:

“[Greif] How many people could the chamber hold?”

¹¹⁶ Blueprint of the Huta Company No. 109/15 dated 24 September 1943; Pressac 1989, p. 327; see Doc. 4.

Lots. Hundreds of people. After they undressed, they were taken straight to the gas chamber.” (p. 295) “[Greif] How many people could be pushed into the gas chamber?

At Crematorium I [II] – as many as two thousand.” (p. 297)

In the Greif Interview the witness did not indicate the size of the “gas chamber,” but in his book Cohen wrote:

“This hellish room was about thirty meters long, fifteen wide and three and a half meters high. It could accom[m]odate a maximum of 500 people but we still managed to squeeze in 750.” (p. 40)

However, the actual dimensions of Morgue #1 were not 30 m × 15 m × 3.5 m, but 30 m × 7 m × 2.41 m (Pressac 1989, p. 286).

The witness describes the room thus:

“[Greif] What did the gas chamber look like?

Like a shower room. The showerheads looked real, the whole scene was very realistic. Everyone who went in was convinced that they were about to take a shower and that the whole thing was for disinfection.” (p. 297)

These “showerheads,” in order to look “very realistic,” had to be connected to pipes, but no witness of the Sonderkommando states such a thing. For the same reason, there could not have been just fourteen of them, as Pressac asserted.

In the Greif Interview, the account of the gassing procedure is interspersed with digressions. From this it can be deduced that the gas resembled “blue-green pebbles”; it was poured from “windows in the ceiling” (the witness does not say how many there were) and equipped with “heavy concrete lids.”

“Tubes led down from the openings into the gas chamber, and I took the opportunity to get a close look at the canisters of gas.” (p. 298)

Cohen took the “concrete lids” from Tauber’s testimony (see Chapter 6), although Tauber insisted that the introduction columns were similar to those described by Michał Kula, a version endorsed by Franciszek Piper, thus wire-mesh structures of a square cross-section, not “tubes.”

If we follow Michał Kula’s first version, these introduction columns measured 70 cm × 70 cm × 300 cm, traversed the alleged gas chamber’s roof, and came out on the outside in a kind of small chimney (some [300 cm – 241 cm – 18 cm =] 41 cm high in order to cover the protruding part of the column); these chimneys probably would have been made of ordinary bricks (about 12 cm wide), so the external surface to be covered was a square (12 + 70 + 12 =) 94 cm on a side. Concrete has a density of 2.1 to 2.5 g/cm³. Assuming the average value of 2.3, a concrete lid with a minimum thickness of 5 cm would have weighed (94 cm × 94 cm × 5 cm × 2.3 g/cm³=) 101.6 kg. Definitely much-more than just “heavy.” In fact, it would have been impossible to for a single person to handle.

The Zyklon B used at Auschwitz for disinfestation purposes consisted of “small bluish cubes (Erco)”¹¹⁷ of calcium sulfate (gypsum).

In the above quotation, “the opportunity” refers to the gassing procedure, so it must be inferred that the SS threw not just the contents, but an entire Zyklon-B can into the “tubes,” which fell on the floor of the gas chamber and allowed Cohen to “get a close look” at it after the corpses were cleared.

In his book, Cohen presents a more-extensive and even-more-imaginative description:

“The room was insulated like a refrigerator and the outside walls were built of concrete. Hollow pillars, eight meters apart, were covered with metal sheeting pierced by fifteen millimeter holes through which the gas flowed in. After removal of a concrete lid, the frozen gas was pushed in from outside in solid crystals of one kilogram each. At least one hour elapsed from the time the incarceration had been completed until the gas solids were pushed in; at that temperature, the gas immediately vapourised into a poisonous cloud.” (p. 40)

The Zyklon-B introduction devices were therefore empty columns of sheet metal (or “tubes”) with an unspecified number of holes 15 mm large (probably in diameter).

On the other hand, he was very clear about the composition of Zyklon B: it was a “frozen gas” which was present “in solid crystals of one kilogram each” or as “gas solids” which, by virtue of a kind of sublimation, “immediately vaporized into a poisonous cloud,” which is further nonsense, because as I noted earlier, hydrogen cyanide absorbed on gypsum pellets did not vaporize “immediately,” nor did it form a “cloud.”

Cohen further explained in the Greif Interview that “In the winter, they put big iron stoves in the gas chamber so that the people wouldn’t freeze when they went in” (p. 297), but in contradiction to this, he wrote in his book:

“In winter, we first warmed the room with a coal fire to accelerate evaporation but in order to be sure that everyone was dead we still had to wait an hour before opening the door.” (pp. 40f.)

This was probably the faint echo of a story already told by Szlama Dragon in 1945:¹¹⁸

“If necessary, the gas chambers were heated with transportable coke burners.”

The first explanation is ludicrous (did the SS fear that the victims would die of cold instead of gassing?), and the second is far-fetched, as even an orthodox Holocaust scholar such as Achim Trunk recognizes (Trunk, Note 85, p. 46):

¹¹⁸ Statement by Sz. Dragon to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on 26 February 1945. 7021-108-8, p. 24.

“The fact that the body heat of numerous people crammed into a room is sufficient to heat it up quickly can be understood from the following comparison: An adult human being generates a thermal energy of about 6 kilojoules per minute, and releases it into the environment. In order to heat 300 cubic meters of air – as much as the gas chambers of Crematoria II and III held – by 10°C, an energy of about 6600 kilojoules is needed (depending on the humidity, but at constant pressure).”

Here again, the theory of pervasive SS stupidity appears, in this case a double folly, because on the one hand they would have adopted a useless measure (heating the ‘gas chamber’), and on the other hand they would have carried out a useless gassing with Zyklon B (coke burners or braziers notoriously emit carbon monoxide which, in a hermetically sealed room, would have killed the victims rather quickly, as is attested by domestic accidents that still happen even today¹¹⁹).

Cohen continues his narrative in a manner no less surprising:

“Through a magnifying glass inserted in the insulated door which was 25 cm thick, we could verify that all movement had ceased. Strangely enough, the corpses nearest the perforations had turned deep purple, nearly black and the further they were from the pillars, the pinker the colour.” (p. 41)

The claimed thickness of the door – 25 cm (10 inches) – is decidedly disproportionate. As documented by Pressac, there were several Zyklon-B fumigation chambers at Auschwitz, which had wooden doors built to standard specifications. One of these fumigation chambers was located in Building BW 28, the Delousing and Effects Barracks known as “Kanada I.” A post-war photograph shows its door slightly opened, so that one can see its thickness: it was made of two sets of normal boards stacked on top of each other, so the thickness was about 6 cm (two inches; Pressac 1989, p. 48, Photo 25).

The claimed skin color of the gassing victims – “deep purple, nearly black” – is nonsense, and the idea that the SS let Cohen and his comrades (“we”) watch the gassing procedure through a peephole is just as preposterous.

Here are the subsequent events in the interview and in the book:

“The Germans waited fifteen minutes and then looked in to make sure that everyone had died. The moment they were sure that this had happened, they gave the order to start up the ventilation system in the gas chamber.” (p. 299)

“Once we were satisfied that no one was moving in the gas chamber, we turned on the air conditioning [sic; meaning ventilation] to evacuate the gas and let clean air in. This lasted two hours, during which we had nothing to do but to pick the pockets of the clothes left on the hooks.” (p. 41)

¹¹⁹ On the night of 4 January 2013, a young Ghanaian immigrant of 25 years died in Genoa in his room from the fumes of a makeshift brazier that he had made from an old frying pan. Newspaper Repubblica, on-line, archive, 4 January 2013.

In his book, the operations first carried out or ordered by the Germans are carried out by the detainees without any mention of the Germans. The “two hours” of ventilation also contradicts Chasan’s related statements that I reviewed earlier:

“First they opened the vents in the ceiling and then, ten minutes later, they opened the door. After half an hour, it was possible to start work. For half an hour you couldn’t go near the gas chamber.” (p. 195)

Cohen also mentions the elevator, but without saying where it was located, since, as I noted earlier, he neglected mention of the basement’s vestibule:

“An elevator took them [the corpses] to the ground floor, over the gas chambers.” (p. 273)

However, “over the gas chambers,” meaning above Morgue #1, there was no ground floor at all, because its roof was in the open in the crematorium courtyard. The use of the plural, in this nonsensical context, would only be justified by the alleged subdivision of Morgue #1 into two gas chambers, but Cohen states nothing in this regard.

He then explains:

“It was a very simple elevator: a slab of sorts, open on all sides, a metal surface on which they loaded the corpses. It was an electric elevator. The bodies were placed on the loading surface and then the elevator went up.” (p. 300)

This is a fairly correct description of the “platform elevator for min. 300-kg payload” that the Central Construction Office ordered from the camp’s metal workshop on 15 February 1943.¹²⁰ However, this device was installed in Crematorium II, not Crematorium III, in which the witness claimed to have worked “until the end” (p. 295), meaning for at least four months. In this crematorium was installed the “patented Demag Electric Lift for 750 kg capacity, single cable, to be raised to 1500 kg capacity by addition of second cable,” as offered by the Topf Company at a price of RM 968;¹²¹ it was duly delivered (Invoice “No. 323 of 23 March 43 for the Demag Electric Lift delivered in the amount of RM 908.-”)¹²² and installed by Topf’s mechanic Heinrich Messing between 20 May and 9 June 1943.¹²³

According to Cohen, the elevator had a load capacity of “Fifteen to twenty” corpses (p. 300), or about 900-1,200 kg, which is commensurate only with the Demag Electric Lift mentioned earlier (the platform elevator had a load capacity of only 300 kg = some five corpses). However, for Chasan it was 6-8 corpses, as pointed out earlier. Sackar, on the other hand, made a clear reference to the platform elevator (“It was a freight elevator, an open lift, made of metal.”), but, as for Cohen, the capacity of the device was “fifteen to twenty bodies” (Greif 2005, p. 114).

Cohen then mentions the activity of the “Dentisten,” who had to remove teeth and gold dentures from the mouths of corpses. When asked by the interviewer, he specified where this took place:

“On the ground floor, about three meters from the furnaces.” (p. 300)

In his book, Cohen describes the furnace room of the crematorium as follows:

“The thirty-five meter long oven chamber was divided into two sections. The crematoria [=furnaces] were located in the first, larger section. The second smaller section was about ten meters long, and had been made into a luxurious chromed and tiled bathroom for the Sonderkommando’s use. Two prisoner teams operated there, each doing a twelve hour shift, from six o’clock to six o’clock. Thus the burning continued uninterrupted for twenty-four hours. The ovens were grouped in units of three, approximately five meters apart.” (p. 42)

In reality, the furnace room was 30 meters long, without any division. The five triple-muffle furnaces were each 3 meters wide, and stood 2.5 meters apart from each other and from the two back walls (the sequence was: $2.5 + 3 + 2.5 + 3 + 2.5 + 3 + 2.5 + 3 + 2.5 = 30$ meters).¹²⁴ For the witness, on the other hand, the alleged part of the furnace room that contained the five furnaces was only 20 meters long, and yet they were “approximately five meters apart,” meaning that there was no space in the room for the furnaces themselves, as their distances covered its entire length (4 spaces of 5 meters between five furnaces: $4 \times 5 \text{ m} = 20 \text{ m}$). To also contain the furnaces (assuming the first and last touching the back walls), the room would have had to measure another ($3 \text{ m} \times 5 =$) 15 meters, in total ($20 \text{ m} + 15 \text{ m} =$) 45 meters.

Into each muffle (a term unknown to the witness) were introduced “[t]hree to five” corpses (p. 303), which burned in a “half-hour” (p. 300), “Because that’s how long it took to cremate the corpses” (p. 300). “Every half-hour, new bodies were placed in the five furnaces. Each furnace had three doors and the bodies were loaded through them.” (p. 303). Therefore, the cremation capacity in half an hour was “between fifty and seventy-five bodies” (p. 303), or 100-150 per hour, and 2,400-3,600 in 24 hours.

As I explained already when analyzing Gabai’s testimony, we are once more in the midst of thermotechnical delirium with these claims.

In his book, Cohen adds further absurdities:

¹²⁴ Blueprint 933-934 of 19 January 1942 of the new crematorium (the future Crematorium II); Pressac 1989, pp. 280f.

“Although male corpses out-numbered females by three to two, in a full crematorium [furnace] the surplus of women’s fat over men’s was always sufficient to keep the fire going. Electrical ventilators incorporated at the base of the ovens further aided combustion. In short, 3600 corpses were burnt in twenty-four hours, without a break.” (pp. 42f.)

Since the alleged gas chamber contained a maximum of 750 people, about $(3,600/\text{day} \div 750 =)$ five gassings would have been necessary to allow for such a huge number of cremated corpses, but no other “survivor” ever ventured such a claim.

The tall tale of the auto-combustion of corpses, fueled solely by their body fat, was widespread among the “survivors” of the Sonderkommando already in the immediate postwar period, and I deal with it in detail in another study (Mattogno 2020, pp. 171-179). The tale was also picked up by Sackar, who stated:

“The fire in the furnace was so powerful that it incinerated the bodies in a moment and made room for more bodies.” (Greif 2005, p. 115)

“But upstairs the furnaces burned around the clock. From the moment the first transport from Hungary came, they didn’t have to restart the fire each time; the fires burned nonstop.” (ibid., p. 116)

The first statement is to be understood not in the sense that the corpse caught fire immediately, but that it was immediately consumed, greatly reducing its volume, which allowed new bodies to be introduced into the muffle “constantly,” as is expressly stated in the German edition (Greif 1995, p. 40). The loading system was still by means of the “stretcher,” but only one corpse was laid on top of it (ibid., p. 115), namely, “the bodies were loaded into them one after another. You couldn’t load them into the furnace on top of each other and all at once” (ibid., p. 116). But this is in contradiction with the introduction of two immediately successive loads of four or five corpses ($2 + 2$ or $3 + 2$) into the muffle as claimed in Cohen’s book (pp. 44f.).

Moreover, for almost two months (during the deportation of the Hungarian Jews), the furnaces operated “around the clock,” “nonstop.” Here as well, we are in the midst of thermotechnical delirium (see also Chapter 6).

Returning to Cohen’s narrative (who is explicitly mentioned by Sackar in connection with Crematorium III: “My friend, Leon Cohen,” p. 115), the fans were not at all “incorporated at the base of the ovens.” The five furnaces were equipped with one blower each, two of which were mounted at the right side of two furnaces, and the other three on the remaining furnaces’ left side, as I illustrate in a drawing (Mattogno/Deana, Part 2, Doc. 223, p. 378). These blowers blew combustion air into the muffles.

Cohen includes other nonsensical anecdotes in his account:

“Four of the commando prisoners pulled the corpses out of the hoist and threw them onto the smooth concrete floor. Other prisoners gripped their necks with the crooks of ordinary walking-sticks, divided them into groups of five, (three men and two women) and slid them along the floor towards the ovens. Another technicality: as it is very difficult to push inert bodies on a dry surface, the floor was flooded to a depth of about 10 cm, and so we had to wear rubber boots.” (p. 42)

Once more we recognize the projection of the survivors’ stupidity onto the SS: only demented people would have dragged 3,600 corpses within 24 hours in such a manner to the individual furnaces, instead of using simple and practical flat carts. (I remind the reader that the furnaces room was 30 meters long, and I might add that the elevator was on the wall facing Morgue #1.)

Flooding the floor with 10 cm of water to make the corpses slide better is even more demented. After all, the furnace room wasn’t a water-treading basin that could have contained any noticeable amount of water without it flowing out the doors. The fable of the “walking-sticks” was widespread among former Sonderkommando members, and was also adapted to even-more-grotesque situations. Dov Paisikovic, for instance, claimed that this method was even used for dragging corpses hundreds of meters across the sandy ground in the area of “Bunker 5”! (Mattoigno 2021a, p. 136)

Dental gold was smelted “into ingots that were two centimeters wide and five to six centimeters long” (p. 302). But in his book, this mutates “into small sheets five millimeters thick and five centimeters in diameter,” hence some type of medallion (p. 43).

Five corpses were introduced into each muffle, “three men and two women” (p. 303), individually according to the Greif Interview, but in two immediately consecutive stages according to his book: first “two men and one woman,” then “one man and one woman”(pp. 44f.). The technique was that of “stretcher.” When analyzing Gabai’s statements, I have already mentioned the impossibility of loading more than two bodies into a muffle (as a simple matter of the size of the introduction door, leaving aside the thermotechnical problems of the concurrent cremations of two corpses); in the reference text I have also illustrated the loading system with the “stretcher” (which was called Trage, Einführtrage or Leichentrage in German). This device was introduced by order of the Central Construction Office, as reflected in the file memo of 25 March 1943: “Crematorium II. [...] For the 5 pieces of triple-muffle furnaces, the coffin-introduction cart is replaced with light stretchers.”¹²⁵ David Olère illustrated this system with an error-filled drawing (see Chapter 6), which Greif reproduced in the German edition of his book (1995, p. 143). From this drawing, Cohen probably took up the nonsense of flames shooting out of the open muffle door, because he states in his book:

“He then opened the door and as the flames started escaping, with superhuman strength, a third prisoner pushed the corpses and stretcher towards the 800 degree blaze.” (pp. 44f.)

However, the flames and combusting gases inside the two lateral muffles were sucked into the central muffle due to the chimney’s draft, and from there they flowed downward into the smoke duct. Anyone opening the muffle doors would have caused large amounts of air to flow into the muffle, thus preventing any flames from being able to come out the door.

Moreover, in his description of how the corpses were loaded into the muffles using a stretcher, both in the interview (p. 303) and in his book (pp. 44f.), Cohen does not mention the essential device of the guide rollers, on which the stretcher rested, allowing it to roll into the muffle without scraping along the muffle grate.¹²⁶

Regarding the cremation residue, the witness uttered more nonsense in his book (numbers added by me):

“[1] However, some human remains such as knee-caps or spines do not easily turn to ashes and they must be crushed with appropriate tools, made either of iron or, as ours were, of wood.

[2] The residue of the cremation and of the crushed bones made a wonderful gift for the villagers who used them as fertilizer. However, sometimes the whole lot was dumped by the prisoners into the Vistula and this is how, as I shall relate later, our comrade Errera died while trying to escape.

[3] By the way, I remember someone stating that it would have been impossible for Hitler’s body to be totally incinerated on the ground floor of his bunker. I believe this to be correct because the ventilation was certainly inadequate, and large bones could not be totally incinerated. So where are those bones? And if they were crushed where are the tools and where is their user?” (p. 45)

Leaving aside the fable of ashes being used as fertilizer, repeated by him once more later in his book (“The peasants swore they were an excellent fertilizer,” p. 74) – but if that was so, then why were they wasted by throwing them into the Vistula? – it is clear that Cohen, despite his claims to the contrary, had no cremation experience at all, because the result of cremations at 800°C is invariably ashes, without any bones being left behind. Cohen probably converted into words a 1945 drawing by David Olère, in which inmates crush bone residues with coarse mallets (a log with a board nailed over it as a handle) in an enclosed room. If we follow the caption, this room was inside Crematorium V (Olère, p. 77), from which one may infer that the fragments being crushed in that drawing were residues of this facility’s 8-muffle furnace. But since those furnaces did not leave anything behind requiring crushing, such an activity would have made sense exclusively in connection with open-air cremations, which are unable to completely reduce corpses into ashes due to their lower and uneven temperatures.

The reference to Hitler's body confirms Cohen's striking thermo-technical ignorance, because the Führer's body is said to have been cremated neither in a crematorium nor on an open-air pyre, but only by dousing it with gasoline, allowing at best the charring of superficial tissue, meaning that the witness compares non-comparable things.

Cohen was not very clear about the date of the Sonderkommando uprising. In the interview, he gave the correct date of 7 October 1944 (p. 306), but in his book, he mentions three different dates:

"On 7 July 1944, Greek Jews, aided by Russian prisoners, staged a remarkable rebellion." (p. 9)

"Even so, the rebellion broke out a few months later, on 7 December 1944." (p. 51)

"One morning, on 7 September 1944, we did not feel like doing anything." (p. 82)

In this context, Cohen invents another grotesque fable:

"The ditches were filled in, trees were planted and the whole site was restored to its former condition. Finally, a new group of Hungarian Jewish prisoners were sent to help us in the Sonder[kommando]. These men were later taken to other camps, mainly Mauthausen, and were immediately burnt. This story caused us a great shock. It only came to our knowledge about a month later but was confirmed by a fifty year old Schupo [police man] who had accompanied the prisoners and then returned." (pp. 51f.)

In reality, only the six inmates I mentioned earlier were sent to Mauthausen (and this was after the uprising, on 5 January 1945, not before). In this context, it is also false that "trees were planted": neither the Soviet nor, later, the Polish commission of inquiry reported this alleged planting of trees in any of the areas of the alleged "cremation pits" ("Bunker 2" and the yard north of Crematorium V).

Cohen regurgitates the hackneyed narrative of the "carriers of secrets":

"Good food, plenty of sleep, good quarters, but no one was allowed to work there for more than three or four months. New recruits arrived and the old ones were dispatched to another camp, supposedly to work, but in fact to be immediately put to death." (p. 29)

But then he forgets this and tells another fable instead. The Sonderkommando had agreed on a rebellion for 19 August 1944 (p. 57), however:

"Suddenly, on August 12, we heard the sound of can[n]on. This caused a stir throughout the camp, and rumours spread that the Russians were only a few kilometers away, that the Germans had started evacuating Auschwitz. What a stroke of luck! There was no need for a rebellion! We were all saved! Other camp inmates, it was rumoured, were weeping and embracing and hugging each other. All this strengthened our firmness of purpose and we all agreed that those Germans, those Nazis, those murderers of women and children would finally pay with their lives!” (p. 62)

This means that the Sonderkommando inmates had no fear of being killed by the SS as carriers of secrets, which supposedly was their motive to revolt!

Cohen very confusingly recounts the alleged extermination of the Gypsies at Auschwitz, without giving any chronological indication (except “one morning”). Apparently, first there was a selection and transport, as inferred from this sentence, “At about eleven, in this happy atmosphere of music, song and hope, the train started pulling out” (p. 72), then

“that very same evening the women and children were sent to the ovens. Crematorium 2, being the nearest, had been chosen. Old people, women and children were viciously beaten to make them hurry to the ovens, but they now recognized their fate and were furiously resisting. In the end we were sent to the courtyard to grab them by force. Undeterred, many continued to struggle and were shot in the neck. For three days and three nights, the carnage went on. [...] As for the others, the men who had left amid music and flowers, they were all slaughtered in Mauthausen.” (pp. 72f., 74)

According to Czech’s version of the events (1990, p. 677), which is also largely imaginary,¹²⁷ “1,408 male and female Gypsies,” specifically “918 men [...] and 490 women,” were transferred to Buchenwald (and not to Mauthausen) on 2 August 1944. In reality, these 1,408 Gypsies were all men, and the 918 sent to Buchenwald (it is not known where the remaining 490 were transferred) were duly registered there. The remaining 2,897 Gypsies, were allegedly gassed in “the gas chambers” (Czech does not specify which ones), and “[a]fter the gassing the corpses of the murdered are incinerated in the pit next to the crematorium, since the crematorium ovens are not operating at the time.” Since only Crematorium V was equipped with cremation pits according to the orthodox Holocaust narrative, Czech necessarily refers to this building. The alleged gassing all took place “[a]fter the evening roll call,” and there was no “struggle” or revolt of the Gypsies.

Hence, Cohen gets it all wrong in his fanciful account.

With reference to the Sonderkommando uprising, the witness invents a nonexistent document:

“No wonder the court sentence (it was read to us that evening), read as follows:

1: Considering that at the outbreak of the rebellion in Crematoria 3 and 4, the commando in Crematoria 1 and 2 were either at work or asleep (what a joke!

¹²⁷ See Mattogno 2022, entry for 2 August 1944, pp. 224-231.

this obviously referred to my friend and myself who emerged downstairs with tousled hair), it is clear that they were neither involved in the rebellion, nor even aware of it.

2: Therefore, the Court has unanimously ruled that the aforesaid prisoners are not guilty and that their lives should be spared. Their unit will now be split into two separate Commandos and they will carry on working as in the past.

This, however, is a provisional arrangement, as we expect in due course to supply the Commando with the normal workforce. [...] When he read out the verdict of the tribunal, we first thought he was having a good laugh at our expense.” (p. 91)

This fable serves to justify the miraculous survival of Cohen, who had already recounted this anecdote in a more-hasty form and without the shenanigans of the “verdict of the tribunal”: the Germans “told us that since we hadn’t taken part in the uprising we wouldn’t be punished. That’s how the men of Crematorium II [III], myself included, survived” (p. 307).

After the uprising, Cohen continues,

“our workforce was down to about a hundred men, half of whom were assigned to Crematorium 1 and the other half to no. 2. To maintain the output we had to burn twice as many corpses: this meant that we had to get rid of 75 people in half an hour.” (p. 93)

But from 10 October 1944 until the end of the month, the Sonderkommando had 198 members, distributed as follows (Mattogno 2016a, pp. 150, 186):

- Crematorium II (Kommando 57 B): 66 inmates (33 on the day shift and 33 on the night shift);
- Crematorium III (Kommando 58 B): 66 inmates (33 + 33);
- Crematorium V (Kommando 60 B): 66 inmates (33 + 33).

The cremation of 75 corpses in half an hour means 3,600 in 24 hours in 15 triple-muffle furnaces. Yet this is not “twice” the claimed “normal” capacity, but rather identical to what the witness considered normal: “In short, 3600 corpses were burned in twenty-four hours, without a break” (p. 43).

Cohen even manages to misrepresent Himmler’s phantom order to end all gassings (Czech dated it to 2 November 1944; Czech 1990, p. 743) as being the end of all cremations:

“In the middle of November, we were ordered to stop cremating. The ovens were immediately extinguished and we spent the next ten days scrupulously cleaning all the ovens, the gas chambers, the morgue and generally sprucing up the camp.” (p. 95)

He even adds a silly lie to this claim:

“Oddly enough, two days before stopping work, we threw a youngish group from Bergen-Belsen into the Crematorium” (p. 95), who were all gassed, of course. But in November 1944, no transport from Bergen-Belsen arrived at Auschwitz.

And finally, here is another ridiculous fable set during the demolition of the crematoria:

“This was our technique: We had to bore a hole into the concrete with a steel gimlet. We worked in pairs; the stronger one used a five kilo hammer on the gimlet while the other rotated it and kept it vertical. The concrete was so tough that it was impossible even to crack it. We knew that the work would get easier once we got through this twenty-centimeter layer. The difficulty was to get to that point.

Eventually, during a fifteen minute break, one of the men laughed and said, ‘If I pee on the gimlet and all around it, wouldn’t that make it easier?’ We laughed with him and decided to give it a try. He found an old tin, urinated in it, told his mate to pour the hot smelly liquid over and around the pillar. He hammered the top of the gimlet with all the strength he could muster. We watched and laughed and, what a miracle: the concrete started to crumble! More urine, the gimlet sank deeper and we roared with delight.” (p. 98)

Another unique “miracle.” In a rare moment of mental clarity, Cohen wrote:

“The Nazis would not be stupid enough to allow witnesses of their atrocities to survive, so it was certainly strange that they hadn’t yet disposed of us.” (p. 96)

In practice, he resorted to the trite loophole of the miracle. In January 1945, the inmates of the Sonderkommando were housed in Block 13 (of Camp Sector BIId), and it would have been very easy for the SS to pick them out and shoot them. Yet instead of this, they were left to their own devices, and could safely mingle with the mass of inmates ready for general evacuation (p. 101).

Importantly, Cohen assures with all seriousness in his “Introduction”:

“Every single incident in this book is absolutely authentic.” (p. 9)

It cannot be known whether this statement was the result of arrogant impudence, incurable stupidity or irrepressible mythomania.

5. Daniel Bennahmias

As mentioned earlier, this witness was sent to the crematorium after having spent some time in quarantine. Here is the related account by Rebecca Camhi Fromer:¹²⁸

“Danny did not know it yet, but these were Crematoria I and II. They passed through one of the electrically charged fences, went down a series of steps, and entered the basement. They were now in Crematorium I, and they entered a huge room identified as the Vestiaire, the changing or undressing room.”

In the “Vestiaire,” there was

“a vast array of hooks set against the walls, heaped with clothing, and a line of benches the length of the room, overflowing with apparel of every conceivable kind.”

The narrator explains immediately afterwards (p. 38):

“At that moment, Danny had no way of telling that 3,000 people – all of whom were Jews – had been asphyxiated.”

Thus, 3,000 people undressed in the “undressing room,” which is even-more-nonsensical than Chasan’s 2,500, as mentioned earlier.

Then, Bennahmias was led to the “gas chamber,” which was “crammed with cadavers from wall to wall, floor to ceiling” (p. 39), which is blatant nonsense, as it assumes that people had been lying in layers on the floor and had reached, layer by layer, up to the ceiling!

“Leaning against this door, which proved to be the entryway to the gas chamber, was an SS officer, who smoked a cigar and seemed very amused.” (p. 39)

This SS officer ordered the Sonderkommando inmates to extract the corpses. Therefore, the door to the “gas chamber” had just been opened, but nevertheless, this SS officer was quietly smoking at the door. But then, he would have also inhaled the hydrogen-cyanide vapors and would have been gassed himself.

The narrator incredibly dares to report, allegedly in Bennahmias’s own words, the crudest black-propaganda anecdotes invented by the Auschwitz resistance movement (pp. 40f.):

“With my own eyes, I saw a German officer shoot a baby of three or four months of age once in the eye and then once in the ear, but the baby still moved its hand, so he shot it again, and then dropped it on the cement. Another time, I witnessed two SS officers toss a dozen or so children in over the heads of the others already crammed into the gas chamber.”

¹²⁸ Camhi Fromer, p. 38; subsequent page numbers from there, unless stated otherwise.

There is no need to comment on these macabre fables.

“It takes about ten minutes to kill 2,000 to 3,000 people in the gas chamber, and the men must now direct their attention to extricating the corpses. This is quite difficult and takes about eight hours to complete. The Sonderkommando prisoners will have to hook the crook of their canes around the necks of the victims and pull very hard to untangle so sorry a human web. When this is accomplished, the body is left in the corridor; if a belt was tied around the wrist as part of the extrication process, it is removed at this juncture. Two men, each of whom has a sack, now work on the corpses. One shaves hair, and the other removes gold teeth. Since the corridor is short and ends probably no more than five feet from this point, it is not difficult to drag the body the rest of the way to the lift, from where it is taken to the first floor. Here we find, at one end, two ‘dentists’ smelting gold and, at the other end, a small room often used to kill small numbers of people, as well as a ladder, which leads to the second floor and the Sonderkommando cots. Between these two areas are the fifteen ovens of the crematorium.” (pp. 44-46)

As noted earlier, killing all victims within 10 minutes would have required huge quantities of Zyklon B, far greater than those indicated by other witnesses (but Bennahmias never says how many cans were used).

In order not to contradict any of the dominating two versions on how the corpses were dragged, he alleged both methods: with the curved handle of a walking stick and with a strap.

Clearing 2,000-3,000 corpses took eight hours, but Chasan’s 2,500 corpses were removed within twelve hours.

From the alleged gas chamber, the corpses were dragged (it is not known by how many inmates) “in the corridor,” which did not exist at all; Morgue #1 in fact opened directly into a 4.06-meters-long vestibule. Next to the door, at the right-hand corner when coming out of Morgue #1, was the shaft that contained the elevator, 1.68 meters wide externally. Here, the width of the vestibule was 5.45 meters; further on, beyond the elevator shaft (2.95 meters long), the room widened and was $(5.45 \text{ m} + 1.68 \text{ m} =) 7.13$ meters wide. Opposite the elevator was the extension of the corpses slide used to move corpses down into the basement from outside. It was 0.8 meters wide, extended into the vestibule by 2 meters, and was 3.45 meters away from the elevator. The distance between the slide and the wall of Morgue #1 was about 1 meter. The door of Morgue #1, initially planned to be 1.90 m wide but later possibly reduced in width by some 20-30 cm, was slightly off-center, toward the elevator, in the room’s 7-meters-wide head wall (the vestibule was slightly wider). Its center was thus about 1.4 meters from the elevator shaft (see Doc. 4). There is nothing criminal about this design; indeed, it is in contrasts to the orthodox Holocaust version.

In the case under discussion, there were two men at work in the vestibule: “One shaves hair, and the other removes gold teeth.” Although they probably only shore bodies with long hair and checked only the teeth of adults, the total number to be processed out of the claimed 2,000 to 3,000 victims still would have been very high. In the orthodox perspective, the claimed gassing victims were about 960,000 Jews and 21,000 Gypsies, a total of 981,000 people, including 216,300 Jewish and 11,000 Gypsy children, a total of 227,300. Therefore, the percentage of children would have been $(227,300 \div 981,000 =) 23\%$. Applying this percentage to the figures adduced by Bennahmias results in $(2,000 \text{ to } 3,000 \times [1 - 0.23] =) 1,540 \text{ to } 2,310$ adults, whose teeth had to be checked for golden crowns, and those had to be removed, and roughly half of the total had to be shorn, hence some 1,000 to 1,500 victims. Therefore, if “extricating the corpses” took “about eight hours,” the work of the two inmates would have lasted, on average, also eight hours without a moment’s pause. This results in an average processing time of $[(8 \text{ hr} \times 3,600 \text{ sec/hr}) \div 1,540 \text{ to } 2,310 \text{ adults} =] 12 \text{ to } 19$ seconds for each adult corpse by the “dentist.” Obviously, to avoid clogging the vestibule, the corpses already processed would have had to be cleared with the elevator at the same rate. The feat is clearly implausible.

When describing the ground floor of Crematorium II, Bennahmias commits two major blunders:

“Here we find, at one end, two ‘dentists’ smelting gold and, at the other end, a small room often used to kill small numbers of people, as well as a ladder, which leads to the second floor and the Sonderkommando cots.”

According to the orthodox version, the gold-smelting room (referred to in the plans as the dissecting room) was located only in Crematorium III (Bennahmias refers to Crematorium II) and the washroom next to the dissecting room was presumably used as an execution room. So these two rooms were located right next to each other, not one on one side and the other on the opposite side of the building (Piper 2000, p. 150; Müller 1979, p. 176). Finally, not a ladder, but a proper staircase led up to the attic where the stokers’ cots were located.

The narrative continues as follows (p. 46):

“Once the gas chamber has been cleared, it must be hosed free of all traces of blood and excrement – but mainly blood – and then it must be whitewashed with a quick-drying paint. This step is crucial, and it is done each time the gas chamber is emptied, for the dying have scratched and gouged the walls in their death throes. The walls are embedded with blood and bits of flesh, and none on the next transport must suspect that he is walking into anything other than a shower. This takes two to three hours.”

Washing the corpses after the alleged gassing is a recurring theme in witness accounts (it was minutely described by Miklós Nyiszli; Mattogno 2020b, p. 41), but that the walls were “whitewashed with a quick-drying paint” after each gassing is asserted only by Bennahmias. It is refuted by the fact that no trace of any paint can be found on the extant interior wall sections of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II. Furthermore, the reason given for this repeated painting – “the walls are embedded with blood and bits of flesh” – is utterly implausible, because the claimed gassing with hydrogen cyanide within ten minutes could not have resulted in any blood being splattered onto the chamber walls, let alone pieces of flesh being embedded in them, not the least because a severe cyanide poisoning quickly leads to “unconsciousness, dyspnea, tendency to convulsions, respiratory arrest” (Berufsgenossenschaft..., p. 30). Flury and Zernik write about this (Flury/Zernik, p. 404):

“High doses – about 0.3 mg/L, corresponding to about 270 parts in a million – lead quickly to death: with a violent feeling of constriction, often associated with cries, so-called ‘hydrocephalic scream’ (Lewin), there is a sudden collapse, followed by convulsions, after a few minutes breathing stops, and after 6-8 minutes death occurs.”

Moreover, in the case under discussion, very high doses must have been applied in order to result in the quick death of all victims, as noted earlier.

The number of Hungarian Jews deported to Auschwitz, “perhaps some 600,000 in all by Danny’s estimate” (p. 47), is vastly exaggerated compared to the official figure of about 438,000 (Piper 1993, p. 199).

Bennahmias then imaginatively embroiders the story of the periodic liquidation of the Sonderkommando inmates (pp. 47f.):

“The Sonderkommando prisoners see themselves as ‘living corpses’; that is to say, they are alive, but they are consigned to death with no possibility of reprieve. Life expectancy may vary from two to three months to perhaps as long as six months, but after that, the men are eliminated. At ‘maturation time,’ therefore, the Germans shipped approximately one-fifth of the Sonderkommando work force to another camp – let us say to Majdanek, for example – to be exterminated. In this manner, disruptions at the crematoria were kept to a minimum.”

If the total liquidation of a Sonderkommando makes sense within the imaginary logic of being “carriers of secrets,” what sense does the liquidation of a fifth of them make? All-the-more-so since the liquidated inmates were promptly replaced by as many inmates, who themselves became “carriers of secrets.” It is clear that the witness invented this story to mitigate the “miracle” of his survival, because allegedly only 20 percent of the Sonderkommando were exterminated from time to time, and he, fortunately, always happened to be among the 80 percent of survivors.

Bennahmias’ fervent imagination unravels even more in the following personal interpretation of an architectural fable related to Crematorium III (p. 51):

“By August [1944], Europe was virtually drained of its Jewish population, and the transports arrived in erratic spurts, so that sometimes 200, and not 2,000 persons, spilled out onto the selection platform. These few Jews would not be gassed in a chamber that 'accommodated' ten times as many people; at least, not for long. It was too uneconomical, too wasteful of the Zyklon B. Crematoria I, III, and IV underwent no change and continued to operate as before, but Crematorium II [= III] was divided in two on a one-third, two-thirds basis. A well-insulated door and wall were built at the farther end of the gas chamber, and Danny and the others in the Sonderkommando were reassigned."

Notwithstanding the fact that there is no documentary evidence of any subdivision of Morgue #1 into two rooms, as indicated earlier, this account is at odds with the orthodox Holocaust narrative, and is also another excellent example of testimonial stupidity projected onto the SS. If the problem was to process smaller transports of about 200 deportees, so as to economize Zyklon B, and if the normal capacity of the "gas chamber" was 2,000 persons (9.5 persons per m²; but Bennahmias also speaks of 3,000), then the logical subdivision of this room would have been $\frac{1}{10} : \frac{9}{10}$, not $\frac{1}{3} : \frac{2}{3}$. This would in fact have produced a room of 10 m × 7 m (= 70 m²) and 20 m × 7 m (= 140 m²), the smaller of which would have had space for 665 persons. Franciszek Piper states that Crematoria IV and V were equipped with three "gas chambers" totaling a floor area of 236.78 m², with the following individual sizes (Piper 2000, p. 168):

- 11.69 m × 8.40 m = 98.19 m² (capacity: 930 persons)
- 12.35 m × 7.72 m = 95.34 m² (capacity: 900 persons)
- 11.69 m × 3.70 m = 43.25 m² (capacity: 410 persons).

If we follow Sackar, the smaller room was meant to handle transports of 200-500 people.

If we stick to the orthodox narrative that these rooms were indeed planned and built as homicidal gas chambers, then we must assume that the SS at Auschwitz, if they weren't lunatic, had divided the total floor area of 236.78 m² into three "gas chambers" precisely in order to economize Zyklon B when "processing" smaller transports. But if that is so, then what need was there to divide the "gas chamber" of Crematoria II and III into two to achieve the same purpose?

On the other hand, as noted earlier, the SS is said to have wasted huge quantities of Zyklon B in order to achieve the rapid death of the victims within a few minutes, although it would have been totally unnecessary within the framework of the alleged extermination operations, where corpse cremation was the bottleneck that would have been in need of acceleration, not the killing.

To close this issue, Bennahmias also gets the chronology of the alleged event wrong. Franciszek Piper attributes the alleged subdivision of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III to the fall of 1943. Bennahmias, however, dates it instead to August 1944, when "the transports arrived in erratic spurts." He evidently ignored the alleged extermination of the Jews of the Łódź Ghetto, 55,000 to 65,000 of whom were deported to Auschwitz mostly in August 1944 (eight transports in August, three in September),¹²⁹ and most of whom are said to have been gassed. Piper wrote later that 60,000 to 70,000 Jews from the aforementioned ghetto arrived at Auschwitz in August and September 1944, and only after that did the intensity of transports decrease (Piper 2000, p. 186).

Bennahmias states that, after the Sonderkommando revolt,

“the abhorred crematoria of Auschwitz never will be used again, although both the gassings and the burning at the pits continue – and by the end of October, some 33,000 Jews or more will have been killed.” (p. 80)

Rebecca Camhi Fromer comments in a footnote: “See Gilbert, Auschwitz and the Allies, 326.” On this page, Martin Gilbert writes, without any reference to the source (Gilbert, p. 326):

“The gassing at Auschwitz continued, particularly of Jews from Theresienstadt. So intensive was the killing that by the end of October more than 33,000 Jews had been murdered in thirty-one days.”

However, in October 1944, only 15,903 Jews were deported to Auschwitz (from Theresienstadt; Piper 1993, p. 192), so the figure of 33,000 is unjustified. Since Gilbert wrote his words long before Bennahmias’ interview, it is clear that the latter (or Camhi Fromer) drew the figure in question from the English historian’s book, as is also evident from the very-similar choice of words used.

Moreover, it is incorrect that the crematoria were no longer used, because Crematoria II, III and V continued to operate throughout the month of October, albeit with a reduced staff (66 inmates per crematorium, 33 for each shift, as noted earlier). Furthermore, if we follow Danuta Czech, “the burning at the pits” did not continue at all but had ceased already on 30 August (“The pits in which the corpses of gassing victims were burned when the crematoriums could not keep up are now covered over in order to destroy the evidence”; Czech 1990, p. 700).

In order to explain his miraculous repeated survival, Bennahmias invented the following story (p. 83):

“On the 16th and 17th of January, the men in the Sonderkommando were in Block 13, the isolated compound in Birkenau. They were dosed off from the general camp, locked behind a wooden gate, and subjected to barracks detail. Nevertheless, one of the Sonderkommando prisoners, who had a friend in the Politische Abteilung, received a message that the Germans planned to kill them, that fifteen men had been selected to learn and do the job, and that the Politische Abteilung kept a record of the fifteen who were going to do this.”

¹²⁹ Piper 1993, p. 186; Czech 1990, pp. 688-712.

“In the morning of the same day [18 January 1945], the entire camp had an Appell, as usual. The men in Block 13 were out of doors for this purpose; they looked out on a team of Germans reviewing the Appell, and when it was over, they took note of an SS officer who called off fifteen numbers – but nobody responded, and nobody showed up. Within seconds – for there was scarcely time to react to the significance of the missing fifteen – a German arrived on motorcycle with an urgent dispatch for a high-ranking officer, and something exceptional happened. Pandemonium broke loose. ‘Everybody, take your things! We are going to leave! Alle Antreten!’ Excitement filled the air. Needlessly, Danny explained: ‘This was a big day for us.’” (p. 84)

Of course, the Sonderkommando inmates mingled with the other inmates, and were thus saved. The transport of evacuated inmates reached Mauthausen, but no frantic search for Sonderkommando members by the SS occurred there, as other witnesses have claimed. Instead, this frantic search took place at the Ebensee Camp:

“One night the Germans came to the barracks while Danny and one of the French Jews, a doctor attached to the Sonderkommando, were lying on the same cot. It was midnight or so. ‘Who here was a Sonderkommando in Auschwitz-Birkenau,’ they asked through an interpreter, and the French Jew began to tremble violently. Danny steadied him; he gripped his leg and held on to it as firmly as he could, for to be detected by this means spelled certain death. In brief, this happened not once, but rather many times, and inasmuch as the Germans were determined to ferret out anyone who had been in the Sonderkommando, the sense of unease increased unabated by thoughts of liberation.

Not long thereafter, it was rumored that Hauptscharführer Moll had received the numbers of the Sonderkommando prisoners from the Politische Abteilung, and that he was expressly in charge of eliminating all survivors. They were certainly sought after, and this seemed plausible enough, but whether or not it was true, Danny cannot say. At some point, Moll was captured.” (pp. 94f.)

In this narrative, the only thing that makes sense is that the SS, if they had really wanted to track down the Sonderkommando inmates (after foolishly letting them escape at Auschwitz), would have precisely used “the [registration] numbers of the Sonderkommando prisoners,” and none of them would have escaped capture. Perhaps to mitigate the “miracle” of survival, Bennahmias does not mention his registration number at Mauthausen, and does not name any of the other Sonderkommando members who were certainly registered together with him.

Regarding the earlier “selections” of the Sonderkommando inmates, Bennahmias goes back to the version of the fable also espoused by his colleague Cohen (“These men were later taken to other camps, mainly Mauthausen, and were immediately burnt”), because Bennahmias claims to have learned “that 180 men who were formerly in the Sonderkommando from Auschwitz had been gassed at Mauthausen” (p. 89). He adds another fable, asserting that “those who survived the doctor’s selection were slated for a shower,” meaning that the doctor selected inmates for them to be killed, but as I have already demonstrated, no such selection occurred at Mauthausen.

I may anticipate that Abraham Dragon stated that he was sent “to the infirmary” at Mauthausen, where he stayed for “about three months” (Greif 2005, p. 175).

Bennahmias’s account has a startling gap: he completely omits any information about cremation. Apart from the sentence I quoted earlier – “Between these two areas are the fifteen ovens of the crematorium” (but Crematorium III had five triple-muffle furnaces, which is not the same thing as 15 furnaces) – he says nothing: neither how many furnaces existed in Crematoria IV and V; nor how many corpses were loaded into a muffle; nor how long the cremation process lasted; nor what the capacity of the crematoria was; nor anything about “cremation pits” (their number, size, location, capacity, etc.), and, incredibly, Rebecca Camhi Fromer did not care at all to ask Bennahmias about these essential details.

6. Shlomo Venezia

In this chapter, I summarize the essentials of what I wrote in a study on this witness whose title translates to The Truth about the Gas Chambers? Anatomy of Shlomo Venezia's "Unique Testimony" (Mattogno 2017), but I also add additional considerations.

As I pointed out in the Introduction, Shlomo Venezia (1923-2012) was the last self-proclaimed Sonderkommando member of the Birkenau crematoria to have "testified." I had already dealt with his first "testimony" in 2002 in an Italian article whose title translates to "Another Witness of the Last Hour: Shlomo Venezia" (Mattogno 2002, pp. 150-160). The sources available at the time were meager. Venezia had gained some notoriety in 1995, thanks to an interview he gave Fabio Iacomini, whose title translates to "The Testimony of Solomon Venezia, survivor of the Sonderkommando" (Venezia/Iacomini). Six years later, his "Testimony given at St. Melanie on 18 January 2001 on the occasion of the first Day of Remembrance" appeared (Venezia 2001). In January 2002, Venezia granted an interview to Stefano Lorenzetto (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002), which was republished in October 2002 with some slight modifications in the Italian weekly journal Gente under a title that translates to "I, a Jew, cremated Jews" (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002a).

In the aforementioned study, I noted (Mattogno 2002, p. 150):

"Just like Elisa Springer, Shlomo Venezia, a self-proclaimed member of the so-called 'Sonderkommando' of the Birkenau crematoria, has been silent for nearly fifty years, but unlike Springer, he has not (yet) written his 'memoir'."

As expected, Venezia filled this lacuna with his book Sonderkommando: Dans l'enfer des chambres à gaz (Venezia 2007), which was soon published in Italian (2007a), German (2008), English (2009) and Polish (2009a), receiving the official endorsement of the Auschwitz Museum with a review dated 30 June 2009.¹³⁰ In 2010, a hitherto-unpublished statement by him was reproduced in a collection of testimonies (Segre/Pavoncello).

Regarding the writing of the book, the following is stated in the "Foreword to the Italian edition" (Venezia 2007a, p. 15):

"This volume was compiled from a lengthy interview by Béatrice Prasquier with Shlomo Venezia, conducted in Rome between 13 April and 21 May 2006, and first published in France in 2007 (editions Albin Michel). In the Italian edition, Shlomo Venezia's testimony has taken the form of a continuous discourse, uninterrupted by the questions that elicited the testimony. The translation from the French (by Maddalena Carli), revised by the author, was based on constant comparison with the recordings of the original interview; the explanatory notes accompanying the text were written by the editors and Sara Berger.”

The French edition’s “Foreword,” compiled by Béatrice Prasquier, provides additional information (Venezia 2007, p. 17):

“This testimony was compiled from a series of interviews I had with Shlomo Venezia in Rome, aided by Historian Marcello Pezzetti, between 13 April and 21 May 2006. The interviews, conducted in Italian, were translated and transcribed as closely as possible to the original version, and edited by Shlomo Venezia himself in order to preserve the authenticity of his account.”

From this we first infer that Marcello Pezzetti¹³¹ “helped” Venezia during the interviews: in what way? By suggesting the expected answers? Secondly, that the interviews were conducted in Italian, but instead of using the original text for the Italian edition, the editors, starting with Pezzetti himself, had the French translation of the original Italian text translated back into Italian, albeit with “constant comparison with the original interview recordings”! These convoluted procedures do not augur well for the “authenticity” of the story.

The importance attached to this narrative is much-more-g geared toward media sensationalism than historiographic in nature: the extraordinary success of Venezia as a witness (his book has been translated into 23 languages, including Arabic, Farsi (Persian) and Marathi (a language spoken in India)!) is above all one of those enterprises that fall under what Norman Finkelstein has called the “Holocaust Industry.” The project was sponsored by Simone Veil, in her capacity as president of the Foundation for Commemorating the Shoah (Fondation pour la Mémoire de la Shoah), which supports the “Mémorial de la Shoah” in Paris and Drancy. She in fact drafted the “Preface” to the French edition of Venezia’s book (Venezia 2007, “Préface”), which is presented as ¹³¹ WIKIPEDIA (https://it.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marcello_Pezzetti; last accessed on 7 June 2022) says the following about this person: “Marcello Pezzetti (Lodi, 25 July 1953) is an Italian historian and one of Italy’s leading scholars of the Shoah. A member of the historical commission of the Fondation pour la Mémoire de la Shoah in Paris and of the board of the Centrum Edukacji of the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum, he is the Italian delegate of the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Remembrance and Research (Ihra), a lecturer in ‘History of the Shoah’ of the international master’s-degree program in ‘Didactics of the Shoah’ at the University of Rome III, and a lecturer within the university orientation courses at the Scuola Normale Superiore of Pisa.”

I confess that I did not realize there was such a luminary in my very own Italy, who also passes for a great specialist on Auschwitz. The Italian newspaper Il Giornale published an article about Pezzetti by journalist Stefano Lorenzetto titled “Italian Lads. The Man Living in the Camps” (15 April 2001, p. 16). The subtitle, taken from one of Pezzetti’s responses, reads, “I have been to Auschwitz more than a hundred times: by now I consider myself sick.” Since his contribution to the historiography of Auschwitz (a field about which he has written practically nothing) can be considered 0.01 percent, if we are generous, I wondered whether Pezzetti might have gone to Auschwitz 100 times in search of delicious Polish mushrooms or asparagus in the Birkenau Woods.

I will deal with this braggart later.

having been written by him in collaboration with Béatrice Prasquier, without any mention of Marcello Pezzetti.

Simone Veil, with the authority of the office she holds and with the halo of a former Auschwitz deportee, weaves a glowing eulogy of her witness:

“I read many accounts by former deportees that take me back to the life of the camp each time. But Shlomo Venezia’s is particularly moving because it is the only complete testimony we have from a survivor of the Sonderkommandos.”

This only shows Simone Veil’s shocking historiographical ignorance.

Like many of the other inmates deported from Greece, Venezia arrived at Auschwitz on 11 April 1944, and he was registered with Number 182727. At Birkenau, the transport was subjected to selection. Venezia recounts:¹³²

“I found myself on the side with the smallest number of people: no more than three hundred and twenty.” (p. 52)

It is probably no coincidence that this number is also mentioned by Danuta Czech (Czech 1990, p. 609). The story continues as follows:

“Everyone else walked, without knowing it, to the side of immediate death in the gas chambers of Birkenau. Instead, the group in which my brother, cousins and I found ourselves [“Dario and Yakob Gabai,” p. 39] was sent on foot to Auschwitz I.” (p. 52)

But his cousin Jaacov Gabai, as noted earlier, claimed that those selected were “[s]even hundred people” (It is unclear whether women are included in this number) which by the way “had to walk three kilometers to Birkenau” (p. 185).

Having been better-coached than his cousin by “historians,” Venezia at least does not repeat the 3-km nonsense and correctly writes that the “Judenrampe” was located “a few hundred meters from the entrance to Birkenau” (p. 54).

The same night, the registered deportees were taken to Birkenau and sent to the Zentralsauna for (actual) disinfestation and showering:

“The next morning, at nine o’clock, German guards came to pick us up to take us to Sector BIIa, the men’s quarantine sector.” (p. 61)

Here, “a few days after” his arrival, Venezia was assigned to a particular job:

“We reached a barracks that was at the end of the quarantine [camp], they called it the Leichenkeller, the corpse room. [...] A small group of prisoners went through the barracks every morning to retrieve the bodies of those who had died during the night. The corpses could then be left to rot in the Leichenkeller fifteen or twenty days, and those at the bottom were often in an advanced state of decomposition due to the heat.” (pp. 66f.)

¹³² In the present chapter, page numbers in the text refer to Venezia 2007a, unless stated otherwise.

There was actually no morgue in the Quarantine Camp (Camp Sector BIIa). Of its 19 barracks, 14 served as housing for inmates, three contained wash houses and latrines, one was the infirmary, and one a kitchen. In April-May 1944, 12 barracks were used as a hospital for prisoners, but none as a morgue (Strzelecka 1997, pp. 71, 73, 115).

The claim that corpses were kept for “fifteen or twenty days” in Birkenau’s morgue has no basis in reality, which further undermines Venezia’s credibility. On 25 May 1944, Dr. Eduard Wirths, the camp’s SS garrison physician, sent a letter to the Auschwitz camp commandant stating:¹³³

“In the inmate infirmaries of the camps of CC Auschwitz II, a certain number of corpses accumulate naturally every day, and their transfer to the crematoria is scheduled and takes place twice a day, in the morning and in the evening.”

The transfer of corpses to the crematoria “twice a day, in the morning and in the evening,” goes in conjunction with the fact that the stoker units were divided into two work shifts, a day and a night shift, as Venezia also stated: “We had shifts from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., or 8 p.m. to 8 a.m.” (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002a, p. 78); “we worked in two shifts, one day and one night shift” (ibid., p. 94).

As for the name of the alleged barracks, Venezia confuses it with that of the basement morgue of Crematoria II/III: Leichenkeller means precisely “corpse basement”; all other morgues at Birkenau were in fact at ground level. Venezia claims that he was assigned to the Sonderkommando of Crematorium III, but it is peculiar that he never mentions the term “Leichenkeller” precisely when he should be mentioning it: Leichenkeller 1 (= Morgue #1) in fact is said to have been the notorious homicidal gas chamber.

When it comes to erroneous terminology, Venezia states that Auschwitz inmates were called “pieces” by the SS (“Stücke”; Venezia 2007a, p. 105), repeating what he had already said in 1995 (Venezia/Iacomini, p. 34). It hardly needs pointing out that no known document attests to the use of that term. By contrast, in thousands of documents the inmates are called, precisely, “inmates” (“Häftlinge”); sometimes they are referred to only by their registration number, but sometimes together with their names.¹³⁴ No other Sonderkommando witness and none of Venezia’s fellow sufferers, except Bennahmias (Camhi Fromer, p. 90), confirms this purported designation of “Stücke,” which is a silly invention.

Venezia then recounts that, “at the end of the third week of the quarantine,” German officers entered his barrack and selected “eighty people, including me, my brother and my cousins” (pp. 68f.). But in Stefano Lorenzetto’s interview, there were 70 selectees (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002).

Together with these 70 or 80 selectees, Venezia was led into Camp Sector BIId “to two barracks that, although inside the camp, were isolated from all the others with barbed wire,” in which the so-called Sonderkommando was lodged (p. 69).

The narrative continues thus (Venezia/Iacomini, p. 35):

“The next morning around seven o’clock, they took us to Crematorium III,^[135] which was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence with six-thousand-volt electricity. Behind the wire fence ran a palisade three meters high. From outside they could see nothing of what was going on inside, only the tops of the chimneys could be seen. As soon as we went inside, the kapo, in order not to put us in harness immediately, told us to stay outside in the courtyard to weed and other such work. At one point, I noticed that the building had a window at eye level, and driven by curiosity, I decided to see what was going on in this crematorium. I walked up to that window, and saw a room full of dead people, so tangled up that at first I couldn’t understand, not like the ones we had seen in the barracks,^[136] but recent dead, all still quite well-fleshed. I didn’t want to believe it.”

At the outset I explained that the first day of work for the Sonderkommando was to be 13 May 1944. At that time, Crematorium III (like Crematorium II) was not surrounded by any “three-meter-high palisade” that would prevent anyone outside from seeing the respective yards, as is particularly evident from Photo No. 153 of the Auschwitz Album, which shows the eastern half and most of the yard of Crematorium III, clearly visible because it was surrounded only by a barbed-wire fence (Pressac 1983, p. 177; see Doc. 5). This photograph also appears in the Venezia’s book, with a misleading caption: “Group of women and children – Hungarian Jews – about to enter Crematorium II” (p. 120). In fact, photos in the Auschwitz Album taken later show that this group of people walked along the camp’s Main Road (Hauptstraße) past Crematoria II and III and, via the Circular Road (Ringstraße),¹³⁷ stopped in the grove near the pond located east of Crematorium IV.¹³⁸

Standing in the courtyard of the crematorium, Venezia noticed “that the building had a window at eye level.” Told this way, the story is rather naïve, ¹³⁵ Venezia uses the numbers II through V for the Birkenau crematoria in his book.

¹³⁶ The witness refers to the morgue barracks mentioned earlier, filled mostly with emaciated typhus victims.

¹³⁷ Street names are also found in the “Birkenau Map” published on pp. 56f. of Venezia 2007a.

because there were 47 windows in that building at eye level.¹³⁹ Venezia had a plethora of choices.

The palisade story is taken from Müller's book, who wrote in this regard (Müller 1979, p. 126):

"Here [at Bunker 2] as well as at the crematorium yards [Cremas IV and V] wattle screens had been put up to prevent the curious from looking in at the death factories from the outside."

In his book, Venezia returns to this episode by writing:

"The first day at the Crematorium we stayed in the courtyard without entering the building. In those days we called it Crematorium I [= II]; we did not yet know of the existence of the Auschwitz I Crematorium. Three steps led inside, but instead of letting us in, the Kapo made us walk around. A man from the Sonderkommando came and told us what we had to do: pull out the weeds and clean the grounds a bit. These were not very useful things; probably the Germans wanted to keep us under observation before making us work inside the Crematorium. When we came back the next day, they made us do the same things. Although they had explicitly forbidden us to do so, driven by curiosity, I approached the building to look through the window to see what was going on inside. Arriving close enough to take a look, I was paralyzed: beyond the glass I saw bodies piled up, one on top of the other, corpses of people still young. I walked back toward my companions and told them what I had seen. They then went and looked as well, discreetly, without the Kapo noticing. They returned with contorted faces, in disbelief. They did not dare to think about what could have happened there. I understood only later that those corpses were the 'surplus' of an earlier convoy. They had not been burned before the new convoy arrived, and they had put them there to make room in the gas chamber." (pp. 72f.)

I first note that, in this version, the scene takes place at Crematorium II instead of Crematorium III. Venezia also omitted in it the untenable story of the "three-meter high palisade." I should add that the crematorium's ground-floor windows came in pairs of double-winged windows, and were all protected by a grate. These are details that could not escape an outside observer.

According to Henryk Tauber, the room on the ground floor of Crematorium II called "washing and laying-out room" ("Waschraum und Aufbahrungsraum"), into which the freight elevator opened, was used as an "auxiliary storage for corpses" in March-April 1943.¹⁴⁰ But even if one were to extend this function to Crematorium III and to May 1944, we are still confronted by the extraordinary fact that, among the 22 windows of that side of the crematorium, Venezia noticed only one, and by (unlikely) chance ended up peeking through one of the window pairs of the room in question.

If we follow Müller, this room was used for executions.¹⁴¹ Of this alleged use, however, Venezia knew nothing: for him, executions with a shot to the nape of the neck were carried out in the furnace room, near the “corner of the last furnace” (p. 99), nor does he mention the use of a room on the ground floor to store a “surplus” of corpses in his later description of his activities inside that building.

The story of the “‘surplus’ from an earlier convoy” is, moreover, refuted by the Auschwitz Chronicle, according to which the last gassing before 6 May 1944 was carried out on 2 May, but the alleged 2,698 victims (Czech 1990, p. 618) would have been cremated in less than two days, if we follow the orthodoxy’s cremation-capacity claims, and also on the basis of the cremation capacity claimed by Venezia (see further below). On the other hand, the first gassing after that date is said to have occurred only on 13 May, although this is a forced and incongruous interpretation by Danuta Czech.¹⁴² So the question remains: which corpses did Venezia “see”?

In the interview published by Il Giornale, Venezia recounted his first day in the Sonderkommando in a totally different way, claiming instead that he was not taken to Crematorium III, but to “Bunker 2” (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002):

“The next day, we were taken through a grove. We arrived in front of a peasant hovel. Woe to anyone who moved or made a sound. Everyone huddled in a corner and waited. Suddenly we heard voices in the distance: they were whole families, with small children and grandparents. They forced them to strip naked in the cold. Then they made them enter the small house. A van with Red Cross insignia arrived: an SS got out; with a tool he opened a hatch, and dropped a box [sic] of stuff inside, about two kilos. He closed it and left. Ten minutes later, a door was opened on the opposite side from the entrance. The chief called us to get the bodies out. We were to throw them into the fire in a kind of pool 15 meters away."

¹⁴² Czech 1990, p. 625; the source is the “List of Transports of Jews,” prepared by members of the inmate resistance movement, which records the arrival of 72 inmates from the Blechhammer Camp for 13 May 1944 (registration numbers A 1 through A72). Czech states that “[t]he remaining men are killed in the gas chambers,” but she does not document that more than 72 detainees actually arrived from Blechhammer, so that the alleged selection cum gassing is a mere conjecture. The above entry is also inconsistent with what she writes elsewhere, because Czech states that on 1 April 1944 the Blechhammer Camp’s inmates were taken over by CC Auschwitz III, and that Blechhammer became one of the Auschwitz subcamps; as a result of this, its 3,056 male inmates were registered with the Auschwitz registration numbers 176512 through 179567 (ibid., p., 604). As of 1 April, only inmates registered at Auschwitz could be transferred to Blechhammer, and this obviously also applied to inmates transferred back from Blechhammer. Therefore, the 72 inmates in question, if they came from Blechhammer, were already registered, and it makes no sense to re-register them with A numbers 1 through 72 (as this was a re-transfer). For the same reason, from Czech’s perspective, it would have made sense to have a “selection” at Blechhammer and to send the selectees to Birkenau for “gassing” – as Czech claims to have happened on 23 January 1944 with 26 Jewish inmates from the Golleschau Camp (ibid., p. 576) –, but to first transfer them to Birkenau and subject them to a “selection” only there would have made no sense at all.

In his book, Venezia confirmed that the SS man in charge "took a box, opened it, poured the contents into the opening, which he immediately closed again, and left" (p. 75). But as I explained earlier, no transport of Hungarian Jews had yet arrived at that time, nor any other transport with which the new facility could have been "tested."¹⁴³

Venezia was also unaware that – according to Szlama Dragon, the orthodoxy's key witness for that facility – the alleged "Bunker 2 was supposed to have been subdivided into four chambers and is said to have had four entrance and four exit doors, as well as five Zyklon-B introduction hatches. For Dov Paisikovic, on the other hand, it had three chambers (Mattogno 2016, p. 228), while the ruins of a building in that area used to have seven rooms, according to the Auschwitz Museum's topographical survey of 29 July 1985 (ibid., p. 238).

Furthermore, the expression "strip naked in the cold"¹⁴⁴ is not only a misfit for the time of the year (6 May), but also contradicts the orthodox version, according to which three barracks were built near "Bunker 2," in which the victims undressed.

At this point, I open a parenthesis. In his essay "The Shoah, Auschwitz and the Sonderkommando" ("La Shoah, Auschwitz e il Sonderkommando") included in Venezia's book, Historian Marcello Pezzetti not only refrains from pointing out this error, but tries to cover it up by asserting:

"During this period of the camp's maximum killing capacity, the Nazi authorities put Bunker 2 back into operation (without undressing rooms next to it), and whose interior was divided into two parts." (p. 199)

But the witness Filip Müller, who is certainly a bit more important than Venezia, wrote in this regard that "The changing rooms [where the victims had to undress before being gassed] were located in three wooden barracks," (Müller 1979, p. 133). As noted earlier, Franciszek Piper also claimed that "new undressing barracks" ("nowe baraki-rozbieralnie") were built near "Bunker 2."

Pezzetti is contradicted even by the Birkenau map reproduced in the book, in which "Bunker 2" (labelled "M 2") is equipped with two undressing barracks! (pp. 56f.)

Returning to Venezia's statements, the gas-tight doors and hatches of the disinfestation chambers (and also of the alleged homicidal gas chambers) were not opened “with a tool,” but by a simple latch. The witness confuses this with the Zyklon-B cans, which were opened with a special tool called a “Punching iron” (“Schlageisen”).

¹⁴⁴ However, the corpses in the morgue were allegedly decomposing "due to the heat." Similarly, during the evacuation in open wagons in January 1945, when it was "unbearably cold" – at least 20°C below zero as Primo Levi reports (Levi, p. 196) – a dead corpse in Venezia's wagon "began to stink tremendously" already the next day (p. 152).

It is unclear how Venezia could have determined that “about two kilos” of Zyklon B had been introduced into the “hovel” from a single “box,” because Zyklon-B cans – which he never describes – came in various sizes ranging from 100 to 1,500 grams of hydrogen cyanide, but none containing 2 kg.

In his book, Venezia recounts the same anecdote more verbosely. I quote the essential passages (p. 74):

“We arrived in front of a small house that was called, as I later learned, Bunker 2 or ‘White House,’ and just then the murmuring became more intense.

Bunker 2 was a small farmhouse with a roof covered with branches. We were ordered to stand on one side of the house, close to the road that ran past there, from where we could see nothing, neither to the right nor to the left.”

Two pages later, a drawing by David Olère from 1945 is reproduced, showing “Bunker 2” (p. 76). There appears a house (the alleged “Bunker 2”) with a door in the center of the facade, a small window in the center of the visible side and a roof covered apparently with reed. According to the deposition of Szlama Dragon of 10-11 May 1945, the roof was thatched,¹⁴⁵ which was confirmed on 10 August 1964 by D. Paisikovic.¹⁴⁶

I should add that Szlama Dragon’s drawings of “Bunker 2” (Mattogno 2016, Docs. 11-13, pp. 224-226) are in direct conflict with David Olère’s, which, moreover, has several fancy elements (ibid., pp. 90-94; Doc. 14, p. 227), while Dov Paisikovic’s description and drawing is at odds with both (ibid., pp. 109-113; Docs. 15f., pp. 228f.). Therefore, the detail of the “roof covered with branches” is probably the result of a misunderstanding of Olère’s drawing.

Venezia then says that 200-300 victims arrived: “People were forced to undress in front of the door.” He once more makes no mention of the dedicated undressing barracks. He then adds (p. 75):

“As for us, we were ordered to go behind the house from where, upon arrival, I had noticed a strange glow emanating. As we approached, I realized that it was light from the fire burning in the pits about twenty meters away.”

He had previously mentioned only one pit, “a kind of pool,” or “a pool-like ditch” (Venezia 2001). Here, however, he speaks of “pits,” in the plural, without bothering to say how many there were.

In an interview with journalist Gian Guido Vecchi, Venezia asserted in reference to the “Bunker” (Venezia/Vecchi):

¹⁴⁵ Statement by Szlama Dragon dated 10-11 May 1945. AGK, NTN 93, Höss Trial, Vol. 1, p. 103.

¹⁴⁶ Mattogno 2016, p. 110, and Doc. 15, p. 228, which reproduces a drawing of “Bunker 5” made by the witness in which the caption “thatched roof” appears (“dach kryty słomą”).

“They would die in 10 to 12 minutes. It was a matter of taking the corpses to mass graves. Until November, they were buried, but then there was no more room, and they started cremating them, on grates made from old railroad tracks. Sometimes gasoline was used, but human fat is the best fuel, and they made us collect it. Tens, hundreds of thousands. Until ‘92, I couldn’t talk about it, in the schools, kids look at me and almost can’t believe it – I have no words to thank Marcello and Dr. Prasquier.”

According to Danuta Czech, the mass graves were used only until 20 September 1942 (and not until November). The next day the “[b]urning the corpses of the dead in the open is begun” (Czech 1990, p. 242). The reason given by Venezia (because “there was no more room”) is blatant nonsense. The incineration “on grates made from old railroad tracks” is commonly attributed to the camps of “Operation Reinhardt,” but no other witness mentioned it in reference to Auschwitz.

Later Venezia embroidered the absurd myth of the recovery of human fat in cremation pits. In the interview that appeared in Il Giornale, he declared (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002):

“Yes, but on the first night, I was used for this open-air crematorium. There was a sloping drain around it where the oil [sic] that dripped from the pyre was collected. I had to collect it and throw it back on the corpses to make them burn faster. You have no idea how combustible human fat is.”

And in his book, he wrote:

“The pits were sloping; human fat produced by the burning bodies dripped down the bottom to a corner, where a kind of trough had been dug to collect it. When the fire threatened to go out, men would take some of the fat from the trough and pour it over the bodies to revive the flame. That kind of thing I have only seen here, in the pits of Bunker 2.” (p. 77)

This story, invented in the immediate postwar period, was elevated to (in)famous literary heights by Filip Müller, who embroidered it in great detail in his book. According to him, however, the alleged “cremation pits” had two small channels, 25-30 cm wide, which ran sloping from the center of the pit down the central axis and ended in two deeper pits, into which the liquified human fat dripped, which was then collected with a bucket and thrown back onto the pyre.¹⁴⁷ For Venezia, however, there was no fat-collection channel dug on a slope, but the bottom of the pit itself was sloping, as I illustrate in Document 6. Only a demented person would have made such a “cremation pit,” which would have led to the pyre leaning toward and eventually collapsing down the slope. Here again, the witness’s stupidity is blamed on the SS.

¹⁴⁷ Müller 1979, pp. 130f.; see Mattogno 2021a, Chapter 7.6., “The Pit’s Structure and the ‘Recovery of Human Fat’,” pp. 126-129.

As I show in a specific study (Mattogno 2014), this fat-collection and -reusage fable is nonsensical already due to the fact that, while the ignition temperature of volatile hydrocarbons formed from the thermal decomposition of corpses is about 600°C, the ignition temperature of animal (and human) fat is 184°C, meaning that on such a pyre, human fat would burn immediately, not the least because the ignition temperature of seasoned wood is 325-350°C. Moreover, if – by any of the many miracles with which the lives of the Sonderkommando “survivors” are studded – liquid human fat could have dripped through the flames to the bottom of the pit, flowed through the burning embers and into the lateral collection pits, Venezia, just as Müller, would have had to draw it from the edge of a “cremation pit” containing an immense pyre conflagrating at a minimum temperature of 600°C! They would have burned to a crisp in no time.

In this account, Venezia adds another made-up story, probably the result of another literary confusion: SS Hauptscharführer Moll was called by the inmates “Malahamoves,” “the Angel of Death” (p. 77). It is well-known that orthodox Holocaust literature attributes this term first and foremost to Dr. Josef Mengele, but for Filip Müller “Malech Hamuwes” was SS Oberscharführer Wilhelm Boger (see Mattogno 2021a, p. 31). No other witnesses has called Moll this way. Anyway, Venezia devotes almost two pages (pp. 78f.) to an intellectually insulting anecdote about a prisoner allegedly killed by Moll, but he does not explain what the Sonderkommando did during a 24-hour-period allegedly needed to “treat” “two, three hundred people in all” (p. 74), which is a disproportionately small number of people for 24 hours, if we compare it with the numbers offered by other witnesses. For Szlama Dragon, for instance, “In 24 hours, in all the pits of Gas Chamber No. 2, at least 10,000 people were burned,”¹⁴⁸ which is more than 30 times higher than what Venezia could conjure up.

However, Venezia worked at “Bunker 2” only one day, which the SS evidently granted him so that he could “testify” about it in the future. In the book, the two alleged events mentioned earlier – the deployment to Crematorium III and to the “bunker” – occurred on the same day (but in the interview published by Il Giornale, the second assignment took place “the next day”): in the morning, Venezia was taken to the crematorium, “around two o’clock in the afternoon” he worked in the “undressing room” (p. 73), and then “around five o’clock,” there was a “roll call,” and Venezia was taken to “Bunker 2” (p. 74). In this regard he specifies:

“Work continued until the morning of the next day. We worked practically nonstop for twenty-four hours, before we were allowed to return to the barracks. [...] The respite did not last long: the next day we had to start working again, and I was sent with a group of about fifteen to Crematorium III." (pp. 79f.)

¹⁴⁸ Statement by Szlama Dragon to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry dated 26 February 1945. GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 19.

However, a little earlier, he had stated:

"However, I did not stay there long; within a week, we were transferred to the dormitory of the Crematorium." (p. 72)

He remained at Crematorium III until 7 October 1944, when he was transferred to Crematorium II (p. 139), in which he had occasionally been before (p. 131). He must therefore have been perfectly familiar with these facilities, particularly how the alleged gas chamber was structured.

Surprisingly, however, in the book Venezia does not describe it at all: he does not indicate its size, its location in the building, how it was accessed, how it was set up inside, whether or not it was subdivided into two rooms.

Here he (but also the "historian" Marcello Pezzetti) missed an excellent opportunity to clarify definitively, with the authority of an eyewitness, one of the most-important and most-controversial points of the alleged extermination process in Crematoria II and III: the structure of the alleged devices for introducing Zyklon B into the gas chamber. Were they simply hollow tubes of sheet metal perforated with holes? Did they have "a spiral" inside them to evenly distribute the Zyklon B, as Filip Müller had claimed? Or were they not made of sheet metal, but rather of wire mesh, and did they have a square cross-section of 70 cm on each side, as Michał Kula initially testified (the self-proclaimed maker of the devices)? Or only 24 cm, as Kula claimed a short while later? Or 35 cm, as Sackar claimed (see Chapter 1)? Or 25 cm, as Topf engineer Karl Schultze stated?¹⁴⁹ And if they were made of wire mesh, did they have a Zyklon-B recovery column topped with a "distribution cone" that could be inserted into the top of the device, as Kula asserted, or a "basket" that was pulled up "with the help of a wire," as Tauber had claimed? Or, as Chasan recounted, were they round metal tubes, riddled with holes, which did not reach all the way to the ground, but had a free space at the bottom to allow retrieval of the Zyklon-B granules? (See Chapter 3.) Or, as Janda Weiss narrated, "There were three columns for the ventilators, through which the gas poured in" (Hackett, p. 168). Or, according to Josef Erber's description, did the devices have all these features together: they were iron pipes (Eisenrohre) but at the same time they "were surrounded by steel mesh" and had a "sheet metal container" inside them that could be pulled up with a rope? (Fleming, p. 204)

In this regard, Venezia says absolutely nothing: we do not learn from his eyewitness testimony how the alleged devices for introducing Zyklon B were made, how many there were, how they were deployed, not even whether they actually existed! And judging from the fact that, according to him, Zyklon B was simply “thrown onto the floor” in the gas chamber – as we shall see below – it is safe to assume that he actually knew nothing about such devices.

Sometime during the 1990s, Venezia was interviewed at Birkenau, atop the ruins of Crematorium III, by M. Pezzetti. In the relevant video, which was posted on YouTube on 9 July 2012, the witness’s confused and rambling answers were “rearranged” decently in the English translation overlay. This was another missed opportunity for the interviewer and the interviewee to clarify the unresolved problems to which I alluded here. I reproduce a brief excerpt of the dialogue pertaining to this issue:¹⁵⁰

“[Pezzetti] C’era una sola porta in questa camera? | Was there only one door?

[Venezia] Una sola porta e siccome era proprio a piano, diciamo, con la terra fuori, si vedeva soltanto quel tombino dove appunto immettevano dentro questo Zyklon B, il gas. | Yes. The gas chamber was built underground. From outside you could see only the trap door into which the gas was poured, the gas called Zyklon B.

[Pezzetti] Quanto era grosso? | How big was the trap door?

[Venezia] Un 60-70 centimetri quadrati e lì il tedesco si metteva la mascherina apriva questo... scatole di Zyklon-B che poi avevano un colore sull’azzurro celeste, una cosa un po’... che poi cambiava colore con... a contatto dell’aria e buttava, si metteva la mascherina perchè aveva paura di aspirare quell’odore e buttava dentro e lì era due di noi, due ragazzi di noi ci ordinava di mettere... coprire con il coperchio fatto appositamente per quel tombino, diciamo, si chiudeva quel tombino. | About 60 or 70 square centimetres. There, the German put on a gas mask, the opened the cans of Zyklon, that had a colour between light blue and azure. It changed colour when it came into contact with air. The German wore a gas mask because he was frightened of breathing the gas. Then he poured it in. Two of our team were there with him and he ordered us to close the trap door with the special lid, made for that. We closed the trap door.”

From this it appears that there was a “trap door” (only one) on the roof of Morgue #1 of Crematorium III; the Italian term he used – “tombino” – actually translates to “manhole” or “drain,” but was translated as “trap door.” This “manhole” measured “60-70 square centimeters,” a gross confusion with a square of 60 or 70 centimeters on a side (= 3,600-4,900 square centimeters). Even the Italian term “mascherina” – face mask – was distorted in the translation as “gas mask,” while post-COVID-19 we all understand full well what a face mask actually is, which would have been absolutely ineffective against gas. In the Italian original, the color “azzurino celeste” – sky bluish – grammatically refers to “scatole di Zyklon-B” – the Zyklon-B cans rather than their contents, which “changed colour when it came into contact with air,” which is simple nonsense. Finally, instead of “inhaling the gas,” Venezia said “inhaling that smell” (“aspirare quell’odore”).

To get a meager description of the alleged gas chamber, one has to go back to his 1995 testimony: “This was a big room, on the ceiling there was a fake shower every meter” (Venezia/Iacomini, p. 35), or to the January 2001 testimony, which is no-less-laconic: “People like this were convinced they were going to take a shower and, in fact, there was a big room with many fake showers” (Venezia 2001). On the myth of fake showers, I refer to what I have already written earlier.

In his book, Venezia simply wrote:

“After undressing, the women entered the gas chamber and waited, thinking they were in a shower room, with taps on top [sic].” (p. 85)

Besides the alleged fake showers, Venezia had previously mentioned only the door of the alleged gas chamber:

“Then they closed the door, which was made like those for walk-in fridges, with a small porthole to look inside.” (Venezia/Iacomini, p. 35)

“Finally, they would close the door, similar to that of butchers’ refrigerators, a double door with a peephole in the middle to look inside.” (Venezia 2001)

In the book, Venezia added only that the door “on the inside was protected by some iron bars to prevent the victims from breaking the glass” (p. 89), a detail likely taken from a drawing by David Olère – to which I will return later – which shows precisely the open door of the gas chamber with the peephole protected inside by a square grid (p. 82). The drawing, in turn, is loosely inspired by the gas-tight door with a peephole fitted inside with a hemispherical protective grid that was found in 1945 in the Bauhof (construction materials warehouse) at Auschwitz, as appears in photographs reproduced by Pressac (1989, pp. 50, 232, 486). Without going into details, I simply note that the door to Morgue #1 (the alleged gas chamber) of Crematorium III was built without a protective grille.

Bischoff’s letter to the DAW workshops (Deutsche Ausrüstungswerke) dated 31 March 1943 refers to an order dated 6 March concerning a “gas door 100/192 for Morgue #1 of Crematorium III, BW 30a” which was “to be manufactured exactly according to the type and dimensions of the basement door of the opposite Crematorium II with a peephole made of double 8-mm glass with rubber seal and fitting.”¹⁵¹ Regarding the door of Crematorium II, Henryk ¹⁵¹ Pressac 1989, p. 436. I explained the function of this door and the room (Leichenkeller 1) in Matogno 2004.

Tauber, who had seen the above-mentioned door at the Bauhof,¹⁵² declared during his deposition of 24 May 1945 before Investigating Judge Jan Sehn that the door to the alleged gas chamber had a small window that “was protected by a hemispherical grating” on the inside, but because it was frequently damaged by the victims, “this window was then closed with metal sheets or a board.”¹⁵³

Instead of giving any description of the murder weapon, Venezia delves into a description of the gassing procedure and the appearance of the victims. He states in this regard:

“Eventually the German arrived with the gas. He would take two Sonderkommando prisoners to lift the trapdoor from outside, above the gas chamber, and introduce Zyklon B. The cover, made of concrete, was very heavy. The German would never take the trouble to lift it himself; two of us would do it. Sometimes me, sometimes others.” (p. 87)

This statement is in radical contrast to all the most-widely accepted ones. For example, the witness F. Müller reported that Zyklon B was poured by two SS “disinfecting operators” (Müller 1979, p. 115). Even more clearly, the witness Miklós Nyiszli, whom Venezia mentions in the book as Mengele’s “Hungarian-Jewish physician assistant” (p. 131),¹⁵⁴ asserted:¹⁵⁵

“They advance across the lawn to where some low concrete chimneys emerge from the ground at a distance of thirty meters from one another. They head for the first chimney. They don gas masks. They lift the chimney cover; it too is made of concrete. They punch open the patented top of one of the canisters and pour the contents, a substance consisting of bean-sized lilac-colored granules, into the opening.”

And here is the related testimony of Henryk Tauber:¹⁵⁶

“They took out of this car with the insignia of the Red Cross in which they had arrived some cans of ‘Cyklon’ [and] took them to the small chimneys for pouring the ‘Cyklon’ into the chamber; there, Scheimetz opened them with a special chisel and hammer, poured the contents of the can into the chamber, and covered the opening with a concrete lid. As I have already mentioned, there were four such small chimneys. Into each of them, Scheimetz poured the contents of a smaller can^[157] of ‘Cyklon’. They were cans with a yellow label glued around them. Before opening a can, Scheimetz would don a gas mask.

¹⁵³ Ibid., p. 129.

¹⁵⁴ Later Venezia forgot about him, writing: “A Jewish doctor who was part of the Sonderkommando told me that one had to make an incision to get the pus out” (p. 143). But this “Jewish doctor” was in fact Miklós Nyiszli.

¹⁵⁵ Mattogno 2020b, p. 40. For Nyiszli, the “gas chamber” was 200 meters long!

¹⁵⁶ Statement by Henryk Tauber dated 24 May 1945. AGK, NTN 93 (Höss Trial), Vol. 11, p. 139.

¹⁵⁷ Referring to the size of the Zyklon-B cans, which came in various sizes.

He opened the can of 'Cyklon' with the mask on, and with the mask on, he poured the contents of the can into the opening that led into the gas chamber."

This is in further contrast to the following statement by Venezia:

"Some claim that SS men wore gas masks, but I never saw Germans wearing any, either to pour the gas or to open the door." (p. 87)

Venezia incredibly makes no reference to the small external chimneys for the introduction of Zyklon B into the gas chamber, as mentioned by other witnesses, because he speaks of a simple "trapdoor" (or rather "manhole"/ or "drain") evidently installed on the ceiling of the room, which had a concrete lid. And, by mentioning "the trapdoor" – singular – he shows that he did not even know that there allegedly were four Zyklon-B openings in the ceiling of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III.

The method described by Venezia with which the SS allegedly filled the gas chamber with victims is nonsense:

"Instead, the men were sent to the gas chamber at the end, when the room was already full. The Germans would let about 30 sturdy men in last, so that, pressed by the beatings, slaughtered like animals, they had no choice but to push the others forward to get in and escape the blows." (p. 87)

But if we follow the orthodoxy's narrative, the "sturdy men" were not sent to the gas chamber, but to work.

And here is Venezia's description of the corpses in the gas chamber after the execution:

"We found them clinging to each other, each desperate for some air. The gas, thrown on the ground, developed acid [sic] from below; everyone tried to reach the air, even if they had to climb on top each other until even the last one died." (p. 83)

This scene is taken, very improvidently, from Nyiszli's testimony. The latter wrote in fact (Mattoigno 2020b, p. 41):

"What a terrible struggle for life must take place there, and yet the time won is only one or two minutes in all! Could they but think about it, they would know that they are trampling their parents, their wives, their children in vain, but they cannot! What they do is a survival reflex! I notice that at the bottom of the tower of bodies [hullatoronynak] lie the babies, children, women and aged, at the top, the stronger men."

Nyiszli had devised this fictitious scene on the assumption that the execution gas used was not hydrogen cyanide (the active ingredient in Zyklon B), but "chlorine in granular form [Cyclon, vagy Chlór szemcsés formája]" (ibid., p. 40), and it is well known that chlorine has a density greater than that of air, so that, if this gas had been introduced into the chamber, it would have precisely flooded the lower layers of air first, and would have risen slowly upward. The first plagiarist of this nonsense was Filip Müller.¹⁵⁸

The scene in question is therefore completely invented.

In this non-description of the gas chamber, the most unbelievable aspect, as noted earlier, is the absence of any reference to the alleged wire-mesh introduction devices for Zyklon B. For years now, revisionist researchers have shown that these alleged devices are a purely literary device without any documentary or material basis.¹⁵⁹ Instead of challenging our conclusions at least by making some kind of anecdotal statement, he completely overlooked this fundamental point of the history of mass gassings in the Birkenau Crematoria II and III! And “historian” Marcello Pezzetti did not care either to broach the topic to his witness.

Venezia says practically nothing about the ventilation system in Morgue #1 either. All we are able to learn from his testimony is that, after the ventilation had been turned on, “for about twenty minutes, an intense humming sound could be heard, like a machine sucking in air” (p. 89), and that “the fan continued to purify the air” (p. 93; italics mine). But the ventilation system in Morgue #1 consisted of two fans, one for air intake (Belüftung), the other for air extraction (Entlüftung). The duration of ventilation undoubtedly stems from a misunderstanding of a sentence told by Nyiszli (Mattogno 2020b, p. 40):

“Twenty minutes later, the electric ventilators are switched on to remove the gas.”

One final observation. Venezia states:

“Undressing took an hour, an hour and a half, often as long as two hours, depending on the people: the more elderly there were, the longer it took, and the first to enter the gas chamber could be waiting there for more than an hour.” (p. 95)

For Leon Cohen, however, this procedure lasted “[a]bout twenty minutes, sometimes half an hour” (Greif 2005, p. 297).

In his book, Venezia narrates in rather general terms his alleged activity of shearing the corpses, which took place “in the room where we had to work” (p. 80). On this room, he provides a few more details (Segre/Pavoncello):

“There was a vestibule five by five meters, on one side where they undressed, on the left the door to the gas chamber, in front a kind of freight elevator, and then the door where those who worked entered.”

This vestibule actually existed in Crematoria II and III. In Plan No. 109/15 of Crematorium II dated 24 September 1943 (see Doc. 4), it is referred to as ¹⁵⁸ As I have documented in Mattogno 2021a, Chapter 4.2., “The Gassing Scene,” pp. 65-73.

¹⁵⁹ See in this regard my paper “The Elusive Holes of Death” in: Rudolf/Mattogno, pp. 291-407, and Mattogno 2019a, Chapter 2.5, pp. 76-85.

This is how Venezia describes the transport of corpses to the furnaces:

“Ultimately, the easiest thing was to use a [walking] stick, and pull the body from under the back of the head. This is seen in a drawing by David Olère. With all the old people sent to die, we certainly didn’t lack sticks.” (p. 81)

The drawing in question is reproduced on the next page of the book (see Doc. 7; also in Greif 1995, p. 240). It shows the entrance to the alleged gas chamber, with the door open (fitted with a peephole protected by a square grating, which I have already mentioned). One inmate is at work at the entrance, another is dragging a woman’s corpse with his left hand, and a child’s corpse by one arm with his right hand toward the furnaces. The left side of the drawing shows the edge of the last triple-muffle furnace. In this drawing, it is evident that the tool with which the above-mentioned detainee drags the woman cannot be a walking cane, because it is curved in the detainee’s hand, when a cane’s curved end should be around the nape of the woman’s neck. The instrument is more likely a strap tightened around the woman’s neck. Such a strap is in fact mentioned in several variations by other witnesses. Nyiszli, for example, wrote:

“They loop straps around the wrists below the spasmodically clenched fists, and so drag the bodies of the dead, still slippery with water, to the elevators in the next room.” (Mattogno 2020b, p. 41)

The scene drawn by Olère is clearly wrong, because it places Morgue #1, the alleged gas chamber, on the ground floor, in direct communication with the furnace room, when it was actually located in the basement of the crematorium. Even Venezia speaks of the freight elevator used to transport the corpses from the alleged gas chamber to the furnace room (p. 91). Incredibly, neither Venezia nor Pezzetti detected this gross architectural error.

Still on the subject of transporting the corpses, Venezia adds:

“In David Olère’s drawing, you can see a corridor of water in front of the furnaces that was used to transport the bodies more easily between the elevator and the furnaces. We threw water into that rivulet, and the corpses would slide without much effort.” (p. 91)

This drawing appears on the next page of the book (see Doc. 8). Let's first examine only its right-hand side. I will return later to the left-hand side, which shows the technique of loading a muffle. On the right-hand side, we see the opening of the elevator with an open double door.

A brief digression is necessary here. Venezia writes that "the freight elevator had no doors; a wall blocked one side of it, and upstairs, bodies were unloaded from the other side" (p. 91). This description is not only at odds with Olère's drawing, but, much more-seriously, with the construction drawing of the freight elevator that was actually installed in Crematorium III. This is the aforementioned patented Demag Electric Lift, depicted in Technical Drawing 5037 prepared by the company Gustav Linse Special Factory for Elevators (Spezialfabrik f.[ür] Aufzüge) in Erfurt on 25 January 1943, which has the heading "Freight elevator up to 750 kg load capacity for Central Construction Office of the Waffen SS, Auschwitz, Upper Silesia" (Pressac 1994, Doc. 25, unpaginated). It shows that the freight elevator had a double-leaf door on both sides. One opened toward the furnace room, the other toward the room called "washing and laying-out room," which I have already mentioned.

Let us return to Olère's drawing. Starting at the freight elevator, along the window wall of the furnace room, a trough approximately five feet wide and a few inches deep runs along the floor.¹⁶⁰ There are no corpses in it; instead, a pile of corpses appears between it and the furnaces. This trough was actually located in Crematorium II. In its furnace room, in front of each muffle, three pairs of furnace-loading rails were originally embedded in the floor, which connected to a perpendicular set of rails running the length of the furnace room up to the elevator. On the rails ran the coffin-introduction cart. In March 1943, as noted earlier, it was decided to replace this device with more-practical corpse stretchers. The ruins of the furnace room of Crematorium II still show the furnace-loading rails that led to each muffle (see Doc. 9); the rails leading to the elevator, on the other hand, were torn up, and the corresponding grooves in the floor in which they used to be embedded mark out a concrete strip that looks like a trough (see Doc. 10). For Crematorium III, it was decided as early as late September 1942 to replace the introduction cart with stretchers,¹⁶¹ so no rails were ever installed in this furnace room, and there was no trough running from the elevator along the window wall.

Venezia's narrative is also inspired by other drawings by Olère.

The account of the victims who, unable to walk, were transported to the crematoria by truck and were dumped by tipping the load bed, "like sand to be dumped, and they fell on top of one other" (p. 98), is a simple commentary on ¹⁶⁰ As inferred from the width of the freight elevator, which was 2.10 m wide.

¹⁶¹ Letter of the Topf Company to the Central Construction Office dated 30 September 1942. APMO, BW 30/34, p. 114, and BW 30/27, p. 30.

Olère's related drawing, presented in Venezia's book as "Women selected in the camp, dumped in front of Crematorium III" (p. 96).

The absurd story he claimed had been told to him by some Sonderkommando men – that "in Crematorium V the trucks directly unloaded the victims, still alive, into the pits that burned under the open sky" (p. 100), similarly comes from Olère's two drawings (not published in Venezia's book) that I have already dealt with earlier (see Doc. 4).

Venezia speaks of two Germans standing at the door of the gas chamber (p. 85): why just two? Because Olère's related drawing shows precisely two Germans (p. 88).

Olère's portrait of SS Unterscharführer Johann Gorges¹⁶² (p. 106) is probably the source of this description by Venezia (p. 105):

"Tall, wide faced, but I don't remember the name. He looked like one of the SS men drawn by David Olère."

The idea is taken from Filip Müller, who describes "Gorges," stating, among other things, that he was tall (six feet; Müller 1979, p. 93).

The anecdote of a little girl found alive in the gas chamber, which Venezia conveys in rich detail (p. 127), is one of the literary topoi of this genre of fiction, like that of relatives encountered in the gas chamber. For example, Miklós Nyiszli devotes an entire chapter to such an anecdote: in his account, it is about a young woman (Mattoigno 2020b, pp. 73-75). Venezia reports instead on the discovery of a two-month-old baby girl alive in the gas chamber. The story is so absurd that it merits quotation in full:

"One day, while I was testifying at a school, a little girl asked me if anyone had ever come out of the gas chamber alive. Her classmates mocked her, as if she didn't understand anything. How to survive in those conditions of a lethal gas that was invented to kill? As absurd as her question may have seemed, it was pertinent, because it happened. Few people have seen and can recount this episode – and yet it is true. One day, as everyone had begun working normally upon the arrival of a convoy, one of the men in charge of removing the bodies from the gas chamber heard a strange noise. It was not that uncommon to hear unusual noises; often the victims' bodies kept releasing gas. This time, however, he claimed the noise was different. We stopped to listen, but no one heard anything, and we thought he had hallucinated. A few minutes later, he repeated that this time he was certain he had heard a gasp. Paying attention, we too could hear the noise, a kind of wailing. At first the moans were interspersed, then they increased, until they became a continuous cry that we all identified as the cry of a newborn baby. The man who noticed it first went in search of where the noise was coming from, and stepping over the bodies found a two-month-old baby girl still attached to her mother's breast, crying because she could no longer hear the milk coming. The man picked up the baby, and carried him out of the gas chamber. We knew it was impossible to keep him with us, and especially to hide him or make the Germans accept him. In fact, when the guard saw him, he did not seem sorry to have to kill an infant. He fired a shot, and the baby who had miraculously survived the gas died. No one could survive. Everyone had to die, including us: it was only a matter of time. A few years ago, I asked the department head of the largest children's hospital in Rome how the phenomenon could be explained. He told me that it was not impossible that the baby, who was feeding, was isolated by the force of the suction at her mother's breast; this would have limited the absorption of the deadly gas." (pp. 129f.)

That the "lethal gas," Zyklon B, had been "invented to kill [human beings]," is nonsense, since it is well-known that it was developed in the years 1920-1923 as a pest-control agent. On the other hand, killing the victims within ten minutes would have required such a high concentration of hydrogen cyanide that the newborn would not have had a chance, like all the other alleged victims. The "explanation" pitched by Venezia can only be considered a facetious fib: can anyone seriously believe that the "department head of the largest children's hospital in Rome" would have told him that the infant had been "isolated [how] by the force of the suction at the mother's breast" and that "this would have limited the absorption of the deadly gas"? Such a scenario would require that the infant held its breath for a good half hour, or was breathing oxygen only from the mother's milk, even when it had ceased to flow! One can only hope that the "department head" is also one of Venezia's inventions.

Venezia gives no description of either the furnace room or the crematoria: he does not even say how many furnaces there were, much less how they were structured and how they functioned. The only thing he recounts in this regard is the loading of a furnace muffle (p. 91):

"In front of each muffle, three men were in charge of pushing the corpses into the furnace. The bodies were arranged on a kind of stretcher, one head-first and one feet-first. Two men, on either side of the stretcher, lifted it with the help of a long piece of wood inserted from underneath. The third man, facing the furnace, held the handles and pushed the stretcher into the furnace. He had to slide in the bodies and pull back the stretcher quickly before the iron got too hot. The Sonderkommando men had gotten into the habit of pouring water onto the stretcher before arranging the bodies on it, to prevent them from sticking to the glowing iron, otherwise the job became even more difficult: the bodies had to be pulled off with a pitchfork, and pieces of skin remained attached."

This narrative is the result of a careless merging of Olère's drawing that appears on the next page of the book with an echo of Tauber's related account. The drawing is the one I already examined in connection with the alleged "water trough," which is on the drawing's right side (see Doc. 8). On the left-hand side appears precisely the scene of three inmates introducing corpses into the furnace's central muffle using a stretcher. This scene cannot correspond to reality, as I documented in another study,¹⁶³ in which I analyzed the drawing in question. In concise summary:

1. The size of the muffle opening is disproportionately large (it was in reality only 60 cm wide and high, and the top of the vault was 132 cm above the floor, while Olère draws it much higher than the inmates).
2. The inmate on the right, shirtless in front of the open muffle door (operating temperature: 800°C), would have been burned fatally.
3. No flames could come out of an open muffle, because smoke and flames were sucked down the smoke duct by the chimney draft.
4. The stretcher's concave sheet metal upon which the corpse(s) lay did not extend close to the handles, but ended at a distance of 160 centimeters from the handles, so that the operator, after fully inserting the stretcher into the muffle (thickness of the masonry: 30 cm) was still at a safe distance from the muffle door (length of stretcher: 350 cm; length of muffle: 190 cm; thickness of muffle wall: 30 cm; hence: $350\text{ cm} - 190\text{ cm} - 30\text{ cm} = 130\text{ cm}$ distance).
5. The loading technique shown in the drawing is incorrect. The triple-muffle furnace was equipped with two guide rollers, attached to a tilting frame pivoting on a round fastening rod welded to the furnace's anchor rods beneath the muffle doors. These rollers initially served as a resting point and guide of the corpse-introduction cart's loading beam, but later merely as a resting point and guide for the stretcher, whose side tubes, as wide as the rollers, rested precisely on them in order to allow the stretcher to slide into the muffle easily (see Docs. 11f.). The technique exhibited in Olère's drawing would have required at least four inmates, because the inmate lifting the stretcher at the far end and pushing it in could not have "slid in the bodies" across the muffle's refractory grate by himself. This would have been the job of another inmate, who had to hold the corpses in place with a scraper while the stretcher was pulled out of the muffle.
The rollers allowed the two inmates lifting the stretcher with an iron bar (not "a long piece of wood," as Venezia incorrectly inferred from Olère's drawing) onto these rollers to remove themselves swiftly to a safe distance from the wide-open muffle door, thus preventing them from getting burned.
6. The stretcher was a lever of the first degree, having the guide rollers as its fulcrum; by placing two bodies of 60 kg = 120 kg (Olère drew two adult bodies and one child body) onto the concave plate, in order to keep it horizontal and push it into the muffle all the way to its end, one had to exert a force of equal magnitude on the handles, meaning that one inmate alone would never have been able to push it all the way into the muffle without it dropping and getting stuck on the grate halfway.

Regarding the cremation capacity of the furnaces, Venezia claimed the following in his first statement (Venezia/Iacomini, p. 36):

“After these operations, the corpses were thrown onto the freight elevator, which took them to the ground floor, where the mouths of the crematoria [furnaces] were. Here, other prisoners would insert them, two, three at a time into the furnaces. After twenty minutes, only ashes and pieces of the larger bones remained.”

These numbers – three corpses in 15 muffles incinerated within 20 minutes – were taken from Nyiszli’s testimony (Mattogno 2020b, pp. 42f.):

“These then place them three at a time on a pushing device made of steel plates. [...] The bodies of the dead are reduced to ashes in 20 minutes.”

This corresponds to a theoretical maximum cremation capacity of (3 corpses per muffle × 15 muffles × 24 hr/day × 60 min/hr/20 min =) 3,240 corpses per day.

In open contradiction to this, Shlomo Venezia stated during the interview published by Il Giornale and Gente:¹⁶⁴

“[Question] The furnaces operated how many hours a day?”

[Venezia] Twenty-four out of 24. We used to work shifts from 8 to 8 p.m. or 8 p.m. to 8 a.m. We used to cremate 550-600 Jews a day.”

So the maximum cremation capacity of the furnaces of Crematorium III was only 600 corpses within 24 hours. The difference between 600 and 3,240 is not negligible! Venezia also states that

“the gas chamber had a capacity of about 1,400 people, but the Nazis went as far as cramming 1,700 people into it.” (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002a, p. 77)

Therefore it took (1,700 ÷ 600 =) almost three days (in reality actually almost six days¹⁶⁵) to cremate a batch of gassed inmates, and he also stated the following explicitly (Fazzini):

“On average, the entire process of eliminating a convoy took 72 hours. Killing people was quick; burning the corpses took longer: there was not a minute of standstill.”

Thus, he confirmed the maximum cremation capacity of 600 corpses in 24 hours. But in his book, Venezia wrote:

“Crematoria IV and V were smaller than Crematoria II and III; the furnaces worked less well and had a smaller capacity. The pits made it possible to ¹⁶⁴ Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002; Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002a, p. 79.

¹⁶⁵ With one body cremated per hour and muffle, and 20 hours of daily operation (four hours letting the coke in the hearth burn out, clean it of slag, and fire it back up): 1 body/hr/muffle × 15 muffles × 20 hr/day = 300 bodies/day.

speed up the pace of corpse disposal: burning seven hundred bodies in such small furnaces was time-consuming, especially since the furnaces did not function properly. In ours, on the other hand, up to one thousand eight hundred people could be inserted [daily].” (p. 102)

Elsewhere, the witness provided further details on this matter (Segre/Pavoncello):

“We took the corpses from the gas chambers, I shorn the hair, my friend, who had said he was a dentist, extracted the gold teeth, and then two other people put the corpses on the freight elevator to the crematorium. Two of the cremation furnaces held 1450 people [daily]; they inserted as many as 1700-1800, crammed together in an unspeakable manner. The other two, IV and V, held about half as many, 750. When they could not get through the amount of corpses, they used the outdoor pits. We Sonderkommando were about 600, but at the peak of extermination activity, which was in August 1944, we reached 900.”

Venezia had had a vague inkling of the letter from the Central Construction Office dated 28 June 1943, which famously mentions a cremation capacity of 1,440 corpses per day for each of Crematoria II and III, and of 768 per day for each of Crematoria IV and V,¹⁶⁶ but it is clear that the “historians” had not explained its meaning to him, because Venezia first attributed the figures concerning Crematoria II-III to their respective claimed “gas chambers” (capacity of 1,450 people, expandable up to 1,700), and only later to the furnaces (1,450 corpses per day, expandable up to 1,700-1,800).

Apparently, there were only one “barber,” one “dentist” and two elevator workers for these 1,700 to 1,800 corpses, and that out of a total force of 900 inmates spread over four crematoria! Venezia moreover confuses crematoria buildings with cremation furnaces.

The Sonderkommando’s strength for August 1944 – 900 inmates – is correct, as evidenced by the relevant documentation known for decades, on which I have already dwelt several times, but the “peak of extermination activity” is said to have been not in August, but rather in May and June of 1944, when, according to Franciszek Piper, 215,436 and 164,425 Jews were deported to Auschwitz, respectively. In total, 228,674 Jews were deported in May, 169,345 in June, 72,419 in July, and 17,218 in August, plus 65,000 during August and September, and 7,936 from August through November (Piper 1993, “Table D,” unpaginated). The total figure for August plus September (Łódź Ghetto) plus November (Slovakia) is thus 90,154 deportees, far below that for May and June. Since the number of alleged gassing victims supposedly was directly proportional to the number of deportees, these two months were also the “peak of extermination activity.”

Therefore, the daily cremation capacity of Crematoria II and III adduced by the witness first dropped from 3,240 to 550-600, but then rose again to 1,800 corpses, without any explanation.

In his interview that appeared in Gente, the question published in Il Giornale (“The furnaces ran how many hours a day?”) was rephrased as, “Were the ovens on all the time?” The answer, however, is the same: “Twenty-four hours a day” (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002a, p. 78). This is another thermotechnical absurdity, because the Birkenau furnaces, being heated with coke, required a daily stop for cleaning the gas-generator grates. This was explicitly prescribed in Topf’s operating instructions for their double- and triple-muffle furnaces:¹⁶⁷

“Every evening, the generator grates have to be cleaned from the coke slag, and the ash has to be taken out.”

This was even stated by Prof. Roman Dawidowski as well, the prosecution’s expert witness at the Höss Trial, and accepted by Investigating Judge Jan Sehn, who wrote that the crematoria at Auschwitz-Birkenau required “an interval of three hours each day to clean the gas generators of slag” (Sehn, p. 137).

Venezia also states that the ashes of the corpses

“were taken to a concrete surface behind the crematorium, where the bones had to be crushed by the inmates with tools similar to those used to beat cobblestones.” (Venezia/Iacomini, pp. 36f.)

This story is taken from Müller’s testimony, who wrote (Müller 1979, p. 133):

“In this connection Moll had thought up a new technique to expedite the removal of ashes. He ordered an area next to the pits adjoining crematorium 5 and measuring about 60 metres by 15 metres to be concreted; on this surface the ashes were crushed to a fine powder before their final disposal.”

However, for Müller, this “concrete surface” was located exclusively “in the back yard of crematorium 5” (ibid.), whereas Venezia places it in the courtyard of Crematorium III. In reality, such a “concrete surface” never existed in either the courtyard of Crematorium V or that of Crematorium III: there is no trace of any, neither in documents, nor in the U.S. air photos of Birkenau from 1944, particularly the very-clear one from 31 May 1944, and there aren’t any structural remains of such in the ground either.

In his book, Venezia gave up the story of the “concrete surface,” writing vaguely instead:

¹⁶⁷ Topf & Söhne, “Betriebsvorschrift des koksbeheizten Topf-Doppelmuffel-Einäscherungssofen,” 26 September 1941. APMO, BW 11/1/3, p. 2f.; Topf & Söhne, “Betriebsvorschrift des koksbeheizten Topf-Dreimuffel-Einäscherungssofen.” March 1943, in: Pressac 1989, p. 222; reproduced in Matogno/Deana, Part 2, Doc. 210, p. 359, and Doc. 227, p. 383.

“The bones were crushed before being mixed with the ashes. The operation took place in the crematorium courtyard behind the building. At Crematorium III, the place for crushing the ashes was at the corner, near the hospital and the gypsy camp. The crushed ashes, which were sifted several times through a sieve like that used by masons, were then transported in a small wheelbarrow.” (p. 93)

The wheelbarrow was also taken from Müller’s testimony.¹⁶⁸

Instead, the idea of “tools similar to those used to beat cobblestones” came from a drawing by David Olère showing two inmates crushing ashes with logs equipped with handles (rudimentary wooden tampers) in an enclosed room inside Crematorium V (Olère, p. 77).

In his first interview, Venezia told the trite tale of flame-spewing chimneys (Venezia/Iacomini, p. 34):

“From the window, we could see flames; it was a scary thing; flames were coming out of a chimney [...].

We still didn’t know anything. We had seen the flames, and had been told there were crematoria [...].”

As I have noted repeatedly, the story of the flame-spewing chimneys is technical nonsense.¹⁶⁹ The witness probably had an inkling of this, because he did not repeat it thereafter. In the interview published by Il Giornale, he stated: “Upon arrival, however, I immediately noticed that smoke was coming out of the chimneys” (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002). Venezia did not mention this lurid story in his book either, but it includes a drawing by Olère captioned “Crematorium II in operation” – with a flame-spewing chimney! (p. 84)

In compensation, Venezia told another tall tale concerning the chimney of Crematorium III (p. 94):

“The work was never allowed to stop; we worked in two shifts, one during the day, and one at night. A continuous, unbroken chain. Only once were we forced to stop work for two days because of a problem with the chimney. Due to too much heat, some bricks had melted and blocked the smoke duct. For the Germans to lose two days of work was a tragedy. A young Polish Jew, covered with sacks to protect himself from soot and heat, opened the base of the chimney sideways, and pulled out the shiny bricks encrusted with human grease that were causing the problem.”

This anecdote is loosely based on a (partly invented) event described by Müller, but dating back to 1942 (Müller 1979, p. 18):

¹⁶⁹ Mattogno/Deana, Part 1, Unit 2, pp. 382-387 (“On Claims of Flaming Chimneys”).

“They had fanned the flames to such an extent that because of the intense heat the fire-bricks in the chimney had become loose and fallen into the duct connecting the oven to the chimney.”

Venezia’s account is surreal and also rather naive. First, “the smoke duct” makes little sense, because there were several of them (three each in the chimneys of Crematoria II and III). Second, each had a cross section of 80 cm × 120 cm, and a smoke duct of identical size merged into each chimney duct. Therefore, “some bricks” would not obstruct anything. Third, as I explained earlier, when breakdowns occurred, the camp administration turned to the Topf Company if the furnaces were concerned, or if the smoke ducts and chimney were affected, to the Koehler Company, who had built them.

But if indeed an inmate were to have entered the chimney, he would not have “opened the base of the chimney sideways” – whatever that even means – but rather the cleaning door located at the base of the chimney, of which Venezia evidently knew nothing.

Finally, in the crematoria, which operated at a temperature of 800°C, the fat from the corpses burned completely in the muffles, so that no “shiny bricks encrusted with human grease” could be found in the chimney, which is gross nonsense.

Venezia also mentions a “chimney room,” which he describes as follows:

“So from time to time, when I could take a break and let the others continue for a while without me, I would go up to that small, square room and play the harmonica to relax, or just lean against the window sill to breathe fresh air. That small room, with one window, and in the center the large square brick chimney shaft, was my refuge.” (pp. 107f.)

But the only room around the chimney was the “garbage-incineration room” with a garbage incinerator, and the imposing chimney was not square, but rectangular (it measured about 4 m × 2.5 m). It was obviously not a “small room,” because it had dimensions of approximately 10 m × 8 m, and moreover had four regular-sized windows and two smaller windows (see Docs. 13 and 13a). On the other side of the chimney, toward the furnace room, separated by a wall, were three small square rooms. The middle one, in Crematorium II, was originally intended to house one of the three forced-draft devices, which were not installed in Crematorium III. The two lateral rooms, each with one window, were called “engine room.” Only the one in the middle had “the large square brick chimney shaft” in its center, but this was invisible, beyond the wall, in the garbage-incineration room, plus it had no window. Moreover, these three rooms were on the same level as the furnace room, so that one could not “go up” to any of them.¹⁷⁰ In conclusion, the room described by Venezia did not exist; it is a pure invention.

Venezia devotes an entire chapter to the Sonderkommando uprising, which begins as follows:

“The idea of the uprising had originated before my arrival at Birkenau, and had survived the various selections thanks to some Kapos who, like Lemke or Kaminski, had been in the camp for a long time and had been in charge of its organization.” (p. 134)

In the interview published by Il Giornale, Venezia had explicitly said that “on average every three months the Sonderkommandos were killed in turn” (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002). This story notoriously originates with Miklós Nyiszli, who had stated more generously (Mattoigno 2020b, pp. 51f.):

“According to the experience of four years, a Sonderkommando lives for four months. Once these have passed, a large detachment of the political SS appears one day and herds the men of the Sonderkommando into the rear courtyard of the crematorium. A burst of gunfire, and half an hour later the newly established Sonderkommando arrives. They strip the clothes from their dead colleagues, and within another hour all that remains of the latter is a pile of ashes. Their first job is the cremation of their predecessors.”

Carlo Saletti commented this as follows (Saletti, Note 12, p. 16):

“There are countless anecdotal and critical texts about Auschwitz in which it is claimed that the life span of the Sonderkommando prisoners was no more than four months, and that once the term had passed, they were eliminated on a regular basis. Neither information corresponds to the truth.”

The story of the periodic elimination of Sonderkommando inmates is also at odds with what Venezia states about their SS guards:

“There were generally two SS man for each crematorium; one during the day, the other at night.” (p. 105)

As I noted earlier, the actual number was a barely higher: 22 guards in four crematoria, 10 during the day and 12 at night. These guards were to keep 870 inmates of the so-called Sonderkommando at bay. In Crematorium III, five guards (two during the day and three at night) had to guard 220 inmates: a bit too small a number, if these inmates knew they were destined for certain death!

As for the rest of the uprising story, Venezia is beyond evasive. He does not mention the official date of the uprising (7 October 1944), but speaks generically about early October (p. 140). He does not mention the alleged selection and gassing of 200 Sonderkommando inmates of Crematoria IV and V at the end of September 1944, which is said to have triggered the uprising a few days later. He does not mention the number of alleged victims either – 451. He does not mention the number of survivors: 212, mostly inmates of Crematoria III and V. He does not mention the alleged selection on 26 November 1944, after which another 100 inmates were allegedly killed. He recounts that “the next day,” thus on 8 October, “the Germans ordered thirty people to go out to continue the work at Crematorium II, and I decided to be part of that group” (p. 139), whereas the orthodox narrative insists instead that the 30 inmates were selected on 26 November to work at Crematorium V.

torium II. It shows the front floor area of the furnace room, the central furnace, the gas-generator well behind it, the rear floor area (to which one ascends via three steps), the central room with the (later-abandoned) forced-draft device separated by a partition, with its floor at the same level as the furnace room, and finally the garbage-incineration room, separated by a wall and with the floor level a little lower. Pressac 1989, p. 288.

Venezia adds:

“When the dismantling operations reached the roof of the Crematorium, the Sonderkommando members went back to sleep in the men’s camp, in the isolated barrack where we had spent our first nights as Sonderkommando. There were less than seventy of us.” (p. 147)

Here Venezia evidently misunderstood the orthodox version, according to which 70 inmates were assigned to the Demolition Squad on 26 November 1944, so “about 100 Sonderkommando inmates” remained, not “less than seventy.”

Like his self-proclaimed former colleagues, Venezia recounts that he fortunately or miraculously escaped certain death because all the Sonderkommando inmates were to be killed. He writes that he had been aware of this right from the start:

“Again from him I learned that everyone who was part of the Sonderkommando was ‘selected’ and ‘transferred’ to another place, but I did not immediately understand that the words ‘selection’ and ‘transfer’ were euphemisms that actually meant ‘elimination.’ However, it did not take me long to realize that we had been integrated into the Sonderkommando in place of other prisoners who had been ‘selected’ and killed.” (p. 70)

Subsequently he asserts:

“For the Germans, the escape of a Sonderkommando member was most serious; they could not possibly afford to let a man escape who had seen the inside of the gas chambers.” (pp. 112f.)

So, how did he manage to save himself? I summarize his long narrative: On 17 January 1945, the SS guard who accompanied the Sonderkommando survivors to their barracks told them that “it was absolutely forbidden to leave,” and then he himself left. But Venezia learned that the camp’s evacuation was in progress, and he understood that they would be killed. So they all went out of the barracks and mingled with the other inmates. Thus, he was able to escape “the planned liquidation of the Sonderkommando.” He then states:

“From time to time, during the night, a German would pass among the prisoners and shout, ‘Wer hat im Sonderkommando gearbeitet?’ ‘Who has worked in the Sonderkommando?’” which would not have been a very sensible question to ask, because, as I explained earlier, at least eleven different Sonderkommandos existed at Auschwitz-Birkenau. Venezia continues:

“No one answered. They kept asking regularly, all along the way; they had no other way to find us.” (pp. 147f.)

There is no need to elaborate again on this classic case of alleged SS stupidity. Later, Venezia and the other Sonderkommando survivors were transferred to Mauthausen. Venezia narrates the arrival and enrollment there as follows:

“I slept two nights outside to be among the last to enter the Sauna. I was with my brother, cousins and other friends from Auschwitz. Soldiers would pass by from time to time asking, ‘Wer hat im Sonderkommando gearbeitet?’ To prevent them from finding out about us, I proposed to my brother to change his name. Instead of ‘Venezia,’ if they had asked me, I would have said my name was ‘Benezia.’ [...] Like at the first day in Birkenau, we were forced to undress completely, inmates shaved our heads and bodies, and we were assigned a number. Unlike in Auschwitz, the number was not tattooed; Auschwitz is the only camp where prisoners were tattooed. Instead, they gave us a kind of iron bracelet with a dog tag; on mine was written the Number 118554, my registration number at Mauthausen. When they asked my name, I said ‘Benezia,’ and misunderstanding me, they wrote ‘Benedetti.’” (p. 153)

And with the help this subterfuge, Venezia was saved a second time. The idea was not very shrewd: if he had said “Benezia,” the registrars might have misunderstood and written just “Venezia”! Indeed, since it is a well-known fact that Jews “arrived in Italy and took the name of the city in which they lived” (p. 17), and since the name of the city of Venice (Venezia in Italian) is known to everyone, the registrars in question would certainly have understood, precisely, “Venezia.”

What is more, in contradiction to this account, Venezia stated elsewhere (Segre/Pavoncello):

“The Germans kept asking who had worked in the Sonderkommando, and I decided to change my name from Venezia to Beneti.”

As I noted at the outset, Shlomo Venezia was indeed registered as Sinto Beneti at Mauthausen, but this is not necessarily a confirmation of the truthfulness of his claims, because he could have read this name in the transport list of 25 January 1945, exactly as I did. Moreover, I have already pointed out that the spelling of other inmates’ names is incorrect in this list as well, which is undoubtedly to be attributed to errors by the scribe, rather than to intentional “misrepresentation” by the registered inmates. If the SS at Mauthausen had tried to identify each inmate simply based on their declaration, without any possibility to verify this, then it would have been foolish on their part to provide false but assonant names, and instead of “Benezia” or “Beneti,” our witness easily could have stated any other name, e.g. (to stay with Italian toponymy) Firenze, Brindisi, Milano...

But this story cannot be true for the simple fact that, as Venezia himself recalls, he and his comrades bore tattooed on their arms the indelible mark of their membership in the Sonderkommando: the Auschwitz registration number. If, therefore, the SS had really wanted to track down inmates who had worked in the crematoria, they would not have sent a soldier around shouting among the inmates “Wer hat im Sonderkommando gearbeitet?,” but would have checked each inmate’s registration number in the sauna during the registration process. Venezia’s subterfuge is indeed disarmingly naive: he changed his surname to prevent them from finding out, which implies that the SS had a name list of the Sonderkommando inmates, but then they necessarily also had a list of their registration numbers. It is therefore certain that the SS did not search for Sonderkommando inmates either at Birkenau or at Mauthausen, and this is explained by the simple fact that they were not carriers of any kind of “terrible secret.”

In the interview with Stefano Lorenzetto, Venezia answered the question “After how many years did you return to Auschwitz?” as follows (Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002):

“Forty-seven. I didn’t find the crematorium. I was disappointed, because I didn’t know that the Germans had demolished it. They must have struggled a lot. It had been built like the Colosseum: it was supposed to last for eternity.”

In his book, he confirmed:

“I did not know that the Nazis, when retreating, had blown up the crematoria; seeing the ruins surprised me.” (p. 176)

In flagrant contradiction to this, Venezia wrote earlier in his book:

“Toward the end of October [1944] came the order to begin dismantling the Crematoria. We continued to work occasionally in Crematorium II, the rare times that a convoy arrived, but we worked mainly on dismantling the other Crematoria. It took a long time, because the Germans wanted us to eliminate them one piece at a time. The structures were very solid; they were built to last a long time. They could have used dynamite, but they wanted to systematically demolish the whole inside of the structure: the furnaces, the gas-chamber doors and everything else. And the Sonderkommando men had to do it; we were the only ones who could see the inside of the gas chambers. Instead, other prisoners, including women from Birkenau and inmates from Auschwitz I, were used to dismantle the outside structure.” (p. 142)

So he had personally participated in the demolition of “his” crematorium!

7. David Lea

I close the series of Jewish witnesses from Greece with the one who testified first: David Lea. He was deported to Auschwitz from Salonika on 9 May 1943, where he claims to have been assigned to the Sonderkommando. On 6 September 1943, he was transferred to Warsaw, from where he was sent to Dachau in late July 1944. After the war, he found himself in Paris, where he was interviewed by David P. Boder on 12 August 1946. Boder was a US-American psychiatrist who “interviewed more than one hundred displaced persons, mostly survivors of the Holocaust,” in the main office of the Joint Distribution Committee in Paris (Zazza, pp. 90, 98f.). The interview was conducted in German and partially in Spanish. The following text comes from the website Holocaust History Channel.¹⁷¹

David Lea: Why—Not want them to speak about what they are doing in crematorium.

David Boder: But how did they finish them. Also in the crematorium?

David Lea: Also in crematorium. And the SS finished in crematorium the same, the, the, eh special commando. After three months with it, then crematorium.

David Boder: Yes.

David Lea: Burned the same. I did not burn, then come the Russian.

David Boder: Aha.

David Lea: When my commando, the special commando, 1500 men did not burn, then come the Russian. And the Germans, no time, no time. When I have time, hundreds have burned.

David Boder: Yes.

David Lea: In, eh, 43 ... the crematorium four, four ... [noise in the background] number crematorium four, the Greek from Saloniki, Athens, has made a bomb. Bomb destroys.

David Boder: Who has done that?

David Lea: The Greek from Athens. In, eh, 34.

David Boder: In eh, eh 44.

David Lea: 44.

David Boder: Were these Jewish Greeks?

David Lea: Jewish Greeks together with the Polacks.

David Boder: Together with the Polacks they did such a thing.

David Lea: Yes. Had ...

David Boder: Torn.

David Lea: Torn, yes, had munitions in crematorium four. Greek from Athens and Polack, Jewish, from the Ghetto of Warsaw.

David Boder: Yes.

David Lea: Have destroyed crematorium four.

David Boder: Where, in, eh Auschwitz?

David Lea: No, in Birkenau.

David Boder: In Birkenau. Exactly, Auschwitz and Birkenau. Eh, how did they destroy the crematorium?

David Lea: The Jewish—eh, Greek and Jewish Polack.

David Boder: Aha, and what did they do to them? [Pause] Eh, did they survive, the people?

David Lea: All destroyed in Crematorium.

David Boder: The people that were in it?

David Lea: ... they too. The people that were in it. [Interrupting] When the, the, eh, person went out [unintelligible] it was with machine gun. The SS said, that when I make nonsense in the crematorium, we is finished. Everything destroyed, inside, with the people, the Jewish Polack and the Jewish from Greece. After two minutes ... finished.

David Boder: Did you see that for yourself?

David Lea: I have seen it not, when I am in Revier [noise in the background]

David Boder: What?

David Lea: I am sick.

David Boder: Oh, you were sick and you were in the Revier.

David Lea: [unintelligible, as simultaneously with Interviewer] ... was in Revier, did not see, but bum.

David Boder: You have heard it, when it happened.

David Lea: Everything, yes. [Interrupting]

David Boder: And after they had destroyed the crematoria, were there still people being burnt in there?

David Lea: Not.

David Boder: No, they did not ...

David Lea: No. [simultaneously]

David Boder: None.

David Lea: Eh, for two days they evacuated the camp of Birkenau. SS has destroyed all crematoria.

David Boder: They destroyed it all themselves.

David Lea: For two days evacuated the camp of Birkenau. April 18, they evacuated with us camp. 16 no 18, eh 18 ...

David Boder: No, no, no, take the hand down. [Interrupting] Yes.

David Lea: June 18, 31 in April, June 18, 45 they evacuated the camp of Auschwitz. June 16, 45 the German destroyed all the crematoria. Six crematoria did destroy the German.

David Boder: They themselves? And how many did the Greek destroy?

David Lea: The Greek destroyed and also the Polack destroyed.

David Boder: Yes, but how many of the crematoria did the Greek ...

David Lea: One crematorium. [Interrupting] One crematorium. One crematorium number four. The same, the Jewish Polack has destroyed crematorium four.

David Boder: Aha, and the rest was destroyed by the SS.

David Lea: destroyed by SS.

David Boder: Now, but, where did you go to after, eh, who has liberated you, the Russians or the Americans?

David Lea: American. April 29, 45.

David Boder: From which camp?

David Lea: From Dachau.

David Boder: From Dachau. Eh, was there a crematorium in Dachau as well?

David Lea: In Dachau crematorium, 44 they made only one crematorium. Why—has done. In Dachau, it is forbidden for the Jewish.

David Boder: What?

David Lea: In Dachau it is forbidden ...

David Boder: In Dachau it was forbidden for Jewish rank. There were no Jews in Dachau.

David Lea: Yes. No Jews, non crematorium.

David Lea: The tragedy that occurred in '44, in Birkenau camp, more or less, I could not speak because my German isn't good ... I don't speak well, but now, I will speak in Spanish. In 1944, by the end of 1944, in November, in Birkenau camp ... in September, October, or November, 600,000 Jewish Hungarians came in Birkenau. When the crematories were not enough to burn the Jews, the SS ordered 3,000 men to dig holes.

David Boder: To make what?

David Lea: Holes, pits. [The interviewee says something in another language to make himself clear].

David Boder: Ah ... hole ...

David Lea: Yes. Pits.

David Boder: Pits.

David Lea: Yes. And, in 27 days, they burned 600,000 Jews alive. We saw them because I worked [unintelligible] commando to the crematory, and I saw them by the front side, they burnt them alive, with wood and benzene. The transportations coming, sometimes ...

David Boder: They burned them in pits, not in the ...

David Lea: They did not burn them ... they did not burn them in furnaces because they didn't have time.

David Boder: Yes. They did not send them to the chambre ... gas chamber.

David Lea: No. They didn't put them in the gas chamber because the Germans didn't have time.

David Boder: And then ... ?

David Lea: They burned them in the pits we had made, with wood and with essence [French for gasoline].

David Boder: With what?

David Lea: With essence, benzene [Benzin, German for gasoline].

David Boder: Benzene.

David Lea: Benzene.

David Boder: Right. Did they kill them before, or what?

David Lea: They burned them alive. They didn't kill them, they burned them alive.

David Boder: They burned them alive?

David Lea: Alive. Six hundred thousand Jewish Hungarians, in November or in September. I don't remember exactly the date and the day, but I remember that I witnessed this, as [unintelligible].

David Boder: Pardon me.

David Lea: [unintelligible] I saw this as if the [unintelligible] were mine.

David Boder: Right.

David Lea: The transportations coming there were guarded by thousands of SS and, in the whole convoy, there were about 20 to 25 or 50 [unintelligible]. And in the last one I saw, there was a German Jeep – they said it was from the Croix Rouge. And the Jews, when they were put in the convoy, they said they would take them to hospital, and the Jews believed it because they saw they were accompanied by the [unintelligible] of the Croix Rouge.

David Boder: What did the [unintelligible] have? A red cross?

David Lea: The [unintelligible] had the Croix Rouge and it had ...

David Boder: What is Croix Rouge?

David Boder: The Red Cross?

David Lea: Yes. It had in the [unintelligible], it had a white flag with the Red Cross, and he said we are taking you to the hospital to examine you, and we are taking [unintelligible]. And then, inside, he opened the gases.

David Boder: I see ...

David Lea: But [unintelligible] knew that, the transportation [unintelligible]. Even us ... we ourselves when we first arrived at the camp. But after one month, two months, three months that I worked in the crematory, we knew what it contained. The gas was brought with the Red Cross. With the [unintelligible], with the Red Cross car.

David Boder: From the Red Cross. Yes.

David Lea: From the Red Cross. As I am explaining ... I am explaining that [unintelligible] caros brothers [unintelligible] you will not to be able to feel. This is the greatest tragedy, the greatest ever in the crematory. [unintelligible] our brothers and sisters. Six million Jews died in the camps, some battered, some of starvation, some [unintelligible] to be put in the gas chamber, children and parents. They could no longer stand the suffering and the starvation, and lice, and the forced labor any more, and they went voluntarily to the gas chamber."

Stefania Zazza publishes several excerpts from the interview in the original German language (Zazza, p. 99), which I translate here into English, warts and all:

"DAVID BODER: [In German] Mr. Lea, you said... what did they want to say about Auschwitz?

DAVID LEA: From Warsaw.

DAVID BODER: Oh. You said you were in Warsaw. Why did you get to Warsaw?

DAVID LEA: I went to Warsaw from to Birkenau six Septembre. Yom Kippur.

DAVID BODER: Yes. Why have you liberated from Birkenau been?

DAVID LEA: From Birkenau transport from the Jewish to work in Warsaw... In camp of Warsaw is large transport, Yom Kippur, come in, eh, Warsaw, only Greek, Jewish barracks."

This statement, not included in the transcript posted on the website Holocaust History Channel, is crucial, because it introduces a chronological contradiction pointed out by Zazza as follows (ibid., p. 98):

"After talking about the selections at his arrival, the interviewee began chaotically telling Boder of the Hungarian transports, dating the events in November 1944 and mixing them with his being in Dachau Kaufering. He also told he had been in Buchenwald for three months and in Fürth and Dachau, which he claimed was not a camp for Jews and where there was not a crematorium (maybe he meant the sub-camp Landsberg/Kaufering). This statement didn't match with the documents and with what he told later."

Nor is the one pointed out above the only gap in the transcript. Zazza cites another passage from the interview where the transcript has a most important omission. I compare the respective texts (ibid., p. 102):

German original (translated):

"DAVID BODER: Did you work in the crematorium? [Interrupting]!

DAVID LEA: Yes, in Bavaria [sic]. In twenty-seven days has burned six, sixty, hundred thousand Jewish Hungarian."

Published English translation:

"David Boder: Did you work in the crematorium? [Interrupting]

David Lea: Yes in c [note: Bavaria disappeared]. In 27 days, they have burnt six, sixty, hundred thousand Jewish Hungarian." (I will discuss this absurdity later.)

According to the transcript, however, Lea was in Auschwitz in November 1944. To explain the contradiction, David Boder assumed that Lea had been transferred back from Warsaw to Birkenau (which the witness did not state), but Zazza categorically rules out this possibility (ibid.), so the contradiction remains and is insuperable.

The witness asserted that he had worked "in the crematorium of Auschwitz," in the Sonderkommando ("in the special commando"), but pressed by the interviewer's repeated requests to describe this installation, Lea could say no more than that it was "a big hall," then spoke confusingly of "towel" and "soap" and gave a delirious description of a gassing:

"An SS from the other room look, all already, all already ... done, all already finished. All is out. Has opened up the Luminette [?] and the gas. In two minutes, one to two minutes, finished two- three thousand men."

Death apparently overcame the victims after just "two minutes," and somewhere there was a "Ventilateur." And that would be the account of a Sonderkommando inmate!

How did the gassing take place? For the witness, simply, "the gas off ... out," or more precisely, the SS officer "opened the gases." Then, "throw the dead in the wagonnet..." (an echo of the fable of the field railway that allegedly connected the gas chamber to the furnace hall already appeared in the Wetzler-Vrba Report), which carried the corpses "into the crematorium."

In this regard, there was a short dialogue that brightly illuminates the witness's extraordinary embarrassment to meaningfully answer even the simplest questions:

"David Boder: Well, yes. What was the crematorium? An oven? [Pause] What was it? An oven, eh, a ... ?

David Lea: Co-, Co-, Coal.

David Boder: Yes.

David Lea: Coal, Coal ...

David Boder: Eh, yes. Was it an oven or ... ?

David Lea: No. Eh, crematorium, crematorium ... [Interrupting] and the"

A rambling answer worthy of a demented person. Basically, the crematorium was a "coal-crematorium"! The poor interviewer, begging only for a little clarity, asked the witness what the crematorium's cremation capacity was, to which Lea replied:

"When I, eh, with transport come every day ten transports of 20 to 40 thousand people. Eight people in one crematorium, twenty minutes burn."

Therefore, every day some ($10 \times 20,000$ to $40,000 =$) 200,000 to 400,000 people arrived and were cremated within 20 minutes. But in this way he did not answer the question, because he did not say how many furnaces there were; on the other hand, appealing to the anecdotal fables en vogue at the time, he said that there were "six crematoria" at Birkenau, that the Sonderkommando staff numbered "1500 men," and that after "three months" they were killed, in order to keep it secret.

Even more confusingly, the witness stated that in 1944 the Athens Jews (of the Sonderkommando) had destroyed "crematorium four" with a "bomb," which, as I noted earlier, is incorrect. The reference is obviously to the uprising of 7 October 1944. At that time, Lea claims to have been sick and was "in the Revier" (= infirmary) at Birkenau, whereas he had been transferred out of the camp a year earlier. Despite this, he claimed to have been an eyewitness to alleged events that he dated back to September-November 1944. The following claims are therefore necessarily false, and, considering their content, also demented:

"In 1944, by the end of 1944, in November, in Birkenau camp ... in September, October, or November, 600,000 Jewish Hungarians came in Birkenau. When the crematories were not enough to burn the Jews, the SS ordered 3,000 men to dig holes. [...]"

And, in 27 days, they burned 600,000 Jews alive. We saw them because I worked [unintelligible] commando to the crematory, and I saw them by the front side, they burnt them alive, with wood and benzene. [...]"

David Boder: They burned them alive?

David Lea: Alive. Six hundred thousand Jewish Hungarians, in November or in September. I don't remember exactly the date and the day, but I remember that I witnessed this, as [unintelligible]."

I already noted earlier that Jewish deportations from Hungary ceased on 8 July 1944, and that the last transports arrived at Auschwitz on the 11th. In all, according to Veessenmayer's telegram of 11 July 1944, 437,402 Jews were deported.¹⁷² Lea claimed instead that 600,000 Hungarian Jews arrived at Auschwitz in September, October or November 1944. But that misdating isn't even the nadir. The worst delusion is his claim that these alleged 600,000 people were all burned alive. The witness also invented a ridiculous rationale: "They didn't put them in the gas chamber because the Germans didn't have time."

¹⁷² NMT Document NG-5615.

Yet, according to him, the gassing was very fast: “In two minutes, one to two minutes, finished two- three thousand men.”

Lea did not indicate the size of the “pits,” but they must have been immense, or countless, since “3,000 men” were mobilized to dig them out.

The fuel used in them was “wood” and “essence” or “benzene.” “Essence” is French, and “Benzin” is German, both meaning gasoline, which the translator mistranslated as the similar-sounding “benzene” (benzene in German is Benzol).

Stefania Zazza tries hard to explain the absurdities proffered by the witness as simple confusions, evidently suffered in perfect good faith, as “linguistic difficulties” (in expressing himself in German, but he could speak well in Ladino – a language also known to the interviewer – which he did in part), as a result of the traumatic events he had experienced, or of his memory being “not good,” then Zazza ventures into deeper explanations (Zazza, p. 101):

“Mr. Lea here mixes his memories with those of another survivor, telling his story as it were his own. [...] Even though David Lea admitted he couldn’t remember much, he had detailed memories of events, but mixed them with the memories commonly shared by other survivors.”

And further on (ibid., p. 102):

“Why Mr. Lea mixed his memories [with those of others] and seemed to talk about two different stories? Mr. Lea’s memory seems to be suffering from an accumulation of memories. This means that he accumulated memories of other survivors, with whom he had been and was in touch in the Displaced Persons Camps and then in Paris, mixing up his own personal experiences with other episodes or events, which are undoubtedly true but were part of a collective memory, shared by the former camps’ inmates with whom Mr. Lea had contacts on a daily basis.”

This might all make sense regarding former prisoners who decided to “testify” decades after the alleged events, such as precisely those interviewed by Gideon Greif (with the exception, of course, of Szlama Dragon), and as Shlomo Venezia. But David Lea was interviewed in early August 1945, a few months after the alleged events: how could he unintentionally “mix” his own memories with those of other former prisoners after such a short time?

8. Eliezer Eisenschmidt

This witness, interviewed by Gideon Greif in Birkenau in the summer of 1993, arrived in Auschwitz from Grodno on 8 December 1942 (p. 220).

“After the Selektion, they took the 315 people who were left over from the transport, including my brother and me, and marched us several kilometers to Birkenau.” (ibid.)

He added that “In all, 450 men were chosen” (p. 222). Danuta Czech states instead that only 231 men were registered (1990, p. 281); moreover, the old railway ramp, as noted earlier, was several hundred meters away from the camp, not several kilometers.

The inmates were taken to Block 20, where they were registered: Eisenschmidt was given Number 80764 (p. 220).¹⁷³ In this regard he specified:

“At that time, there were only two camps in Birkenau: A and B. A was for men prisoners and B was for women prisoners” (p. 222)

In fact, the Men’s Camp was in Camp Sector BIb, which in July 1943 became the Women’s Camp. In an article devoted to it, Irena Strzelecka states that Block 22 was an “admission block” where newly arrived inmates were registered (Strzelecka 1995, p. 261). Blocks 19, 20, 21 and 26 were for the quarantine; Blocks 2, 5, 6, 13-22 and 24-27 were lodging inmates (ibid., pp. 242, 264). Building 5a was the well-known delousing facility, which also included a “wash and shower room.”

After these clarifications, we can return to Eisenschmidt’s account. His reference to Block 20 is incorrect, since registration took place in Block 22. Then, “all the 315 people who remained from the transport reached Block 9” (p. 221). On the evening of 9 December 1942, the witness was assigned to the Sonderkommando: “Eighty or a hundred people were selected for the Sonderkommando of Block 2. Everything went fast” (ibid.).

“The Sonderkommando prisoners were divided into two groups at that time, Sonderkommando I and Sonderkommando II, because they worked in Bunker I and Bunker II. I was in the Sonderkommando I group.” (ibid.)

The selectees were transferred to Block 2, which “was reserved for the Sonderkommando men.” To G. Greif’s question, “When did you first hear the word ‘Sonderkommando’ and realize that you were part of it?” Eisenschmidt answered:

¹⁷³ The Auschwitz Museum’s online database records the inmate Lejzer Ajzenszmidt under this number. This was evidently the witness’s real Polish name, who later Germanized it to Eisenschmidt, phonetically identical to Ajzenszmidt.

“It was the morning after the head count on December 10, 1942. When we went out to the forest, we heard the Kapo tell the SS men who stood at the gate, ‘Sonderkommando I, 130 men.’” (p. 223)

Shortly thereafter, however, he stated:

“We were divided into two groups: Sonderkommando I and Sonderkommando II. There were about 150 men in each group.” (p. 223),

Although he had just stated that “Sonderkommando 1” counted 130 men.

A comparison with the related statements of the Dragon brothers is due here. Szlama and Abraham Dragon arrived at Auschwitz with a transport from the Mława Ghetto on 6 December 1942, two days before Eisenschmidt. From this transport, 406 men were registered (numbers 80262-80667). Szlama received Number 80359, Abraham received Number 80360 (p. 131). Abraham recounted, erroneously, that the 200 selectees were sent to Block 25, where “they put everyone who reached the camp before they divided them up” (p. 130): It thus served as the admission block, although that was actually Block 22. Here, on the night of 9 December 1942, 100 inmates were selected and sent to Block 2, about which Shlomo said:

“This block had belonged to a group that had worked there before us; its members had been murdered a day or two earlier. Their clothes were still lying there, as if they’d just taken them off.”

And Abraham confirmed:

“We could tell that there’d been people there just a short time earlier. There was leftover food and other stuff all over the place. We didn’t know at that time that the people there had been the previous members of the Sonderkommando. Only later we were told that they’d been brought there and murdered. We took their places.” (p. 130)

But Eisenschmidt, who was sent to Block 2 on the same day (9 December 1942) knew nothing of this. And Szlama Dragon didn’t know anything about this either in 1945, because in this regard he declared back then:¹⁷⁴

“From Barracks No. 14, all those selected for the Sonderkommando /Special Kommando/ were transferred to Barracks No. 2, which was located approximately one kilometer away from the gas chamber. Barracks No. 2 was fenced off with 1.5-2-meter-high iron wires. SS guards armed with submachine guns escorted the Sonderkommando from the barracks to work and back to the barracks. No member of the Sonderkommando had the right or means to communicate with other camp inmates who were not working in the Sonderkommando; however, some found a way and, risking their lives, made contact with the camp inmates.”

¹⁷⁴ Statement by Szlama Dragon to the Soviet Investigative Commission dated 2 February 1945, GARF, 7021-108-8, pp. 14-27; here p. 16.

Neither Abraham nor Szlama Dragon knew anything of a division into “Sonderkommando 1” and “Sonderkommando 2”:

“The group was called the Sonderkommando from the very beginning. In the women’s camp, there were two special blocks, Block 1 and Block 2. Block 1 was called the Strafkommando, the penal detail, and we, in Block 2, were called the Sonderkommando.” (p. 132)

Both Abraham (p. 131) and Shlomo (p. 132) agree that 100 inmates were selected for the Sonderkommando, and that they stayed in Block 2. Presumably on the same day, another 100 were added, because Shlomo says with reference to Block 2:

“A hundred men were taken there. We were five to a bunk, and there was only one blanket for all of us.” (p. 132)

Otherwise the later statement would make no sense that the SS “led the two groups, about a hundred men in each group, out of the Birkenau camp, toward the village of Brzezinka” (p. 132).

To recapitulate, for the Dragon brothers, the Sonderkommando lodged in Block 2 consisted of 200 men, for Eisenschmidt it consisted of 300. And although they were housed in the same block, the Dragon brothers never mention Eisenschmidt nor vice-versa.

Back to Eisenschmidt’s account, who claims that “Sonderkommando 1” was taken “into the forest,” where it was divided into two groups: one was assigned to the “room where the valuables were kept,” the other “was tasked with cremating bodies” (p. 223). The witness does not say how many inmates were assigned to each of the two groups. From the group assigned to cremating bodies, some inmates who claimed to be barbers and dentists were assigned to cutting hair and extracting gold teeth from corpses,

“The rest were divided into groups of six. For example, six men pushed the carts that carried the bodies, another six were Shlepern [=Schleppern; German for draggers], the ones who dragged corpses to the carts.”

Eisenschmidt was among the six who worked on the carts (ibid.).

In his statement to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on 26 February 1945, Szlama Dragon gave following division of labor of the inmates of the Sonderkommando in connection with “Bunker 2” (although at the time he was unfamiliar with that term):¹⁷⁵

- 12 inmates: removal of corpses from gas chambers
- 30 inmates: loading corpses onto carts
- 10 inmates: transporting corpses to carts
- 20 inmates: placing corpses in cremation pits
- 28 inmates: transporting wood to cremation pits
- 2 inmate “dentists”

¹⁷⁵ GARF, 7021-108-8, pp. 16f.

– 2 inmate “barbers”

Totaling 104 inmates.

Since “Bunker 1” had a smaller floor area than “Bunker 2” (circa 90 m² against 142 m²; Piper 2000, p. 134), the number of “dentists” and “barbers” could be no more than the number indicated by Dragon for “Bunker 2”: (2 + 2 =) four inmates. Thus, if we follow Eisenschmidt, then the Sonderkommando of “Bunker 1” consisted of 130 inmates (if not 150), who were divided into four “dentists” plus “barbers,” and into $([130 - 4] \div 6 =)$ 21 groups of six inmates each, who did exactly which tasks? Eisenschmidt gives an “example” by saying that “six men pushed the carts,” another six dragged corpses to the carts, and another group consisted of “stokers” who kept “an eye on the fire.” But then, what did the other 18 groups do?

Regarding these carts, which ran “on rails” (Greif 1995, p. 178; omitted in the English edition), the witness provides some details:

“Six carts were used to haul the bodies. [...] Ten to fifteen bodies were loaded onto each cart.” (p. 224)

Hence, six carts with a capacity of 10-15 corpses. In his statement of 26 February 1945, Szlama Dragon had claimed that there were five carts which each could transport 25-30 corpses. The difference is not insignificant, because in one case a maximum of $(6 \times 15 =)$ 90 corpses could be transported in one batch, in the other $(5 \times 30 =)$ 150 corpses.

About “Bunker 1,” Eisenschmidt stated:

“They led us into the yard and opened the door of the building that was used as a gas chamber, and we were overwhelmed with grief. [...] We saw the bodies in the gas chamber.” (p. 223)

“On the door there was a sign saying, ‘Shower.’ There were two entrances: one to lead the victims in and another to take the bodies out. The ‘Shower’ sign was posted on the other door, right opposite the entrance door.” (p. 225)

“They brought them all to wooden shacks [Greif 1995, p. 179: “3 and 4”], which served as undressing rooms. They used to be stables. The people were forced to undress there and then they had to run naked to the house that was used as the gas chamber. They had to run across the compound naked in all kinds of weather.” (ibid.)

This description does not at all match that of Franciszek Piper: “Bunker 1” was divided into two gas chambers, while Eisenschmidt always speaks of “gas chamber” in the singular, each of which had only one door. For Eisenschmidt, the only “gas chamber” had two facing doors: one entrance and one exit door (to remove the corpses), and on this one was affixed the sign “Shower”. Piper claims instead that the sign was attached to the entrance door and had the inscription “To Disinfection.” Eisenschmidt further states that “All the windows and openings of the building were sealed with rubber gaskets to keep the gas from leaking out.” (ibid.), but Piper writes that “the windows were walled over.”

Eisenschmidt is the only witness who numbers the alleged undressing huts as “Shacks 3 and 4” (which the English translator omitted), which suggests that there were also “Shacks 1 and 2.” Piper instead speaks explicitly of “two barracks” (Piper 2000, pp. 134f.).

The witness knew – we do not know how – that inside the gas chamber “the people began to smell it” (p. 225). Szlama Dragon also mentions this:

“We smelled gas.” (p. 133)

“It was terribly hot in the gas chamber and you could sense the sweetish taste of the gas.” (p. 136)

But the Sonderkommando inmates wore gas masks, preventing them from smelling anything: “We were given gas masks” (p. 135).

In line with the imaginative narratives of the other Greek witnesses, Eisenschmidt also stated that the term “Bunker” referred to “cremation pits”:

“The pits, or ‘bunkers,’ as they were also called, were wide and deep.” (p. 224)

However, he was careful enough not to report how many there were and what their sizes were. But he added more nonsense instead:

“The fire was started before the bodies were thrown in.” (ibid.)

Therefore, the corpses were thrown into the conflagrating pits, evidently from a safe distance with special body-throwing catapults, or else the corpse “throwers” would have been fatally burned, and the corpses would have fallen only along the edges of the pits.

But then, he instantly contradicts himself when reporting another cremation technique, where the bodies are already in the “pits”:

“After all the bodies were placed in the pits, the ‘stokers’ took gasoline and set the wooden beams on fire. As the fire burned, the ‘stokers’ piled the bodies into a heap so that they’d burn faster. The Germans designed the cremation procedure so that the fat of the bodies would fuel the fire. In other words, the bodies themselves were the fuel.

When we got there, the pits were still empty and they hadn’t yet begun to burn the bodies. So the intensity of the fire depended on the wooden beams that were soaked with fuel. Later on, the fire was fed by the fat of the bodies that remained in the pits. It took a whole day and sometimes even a day and a half to cremate the bodies in one pit. When there were no more corpses to burn, we had to cut down trees and clean up the gas chamber.” (pp. 224f.)

Leaving aside the SS’s implausible waste of “gasoline” and “wooden beams,” the witness introduces a new variant of the fable of the recovery of human fat in the “cremation pits”: once combustion with “wooden beams” had been started, the corpses burned on their own because the corpse fat acted as fuel, and sustained the combustion on its own, a blatant nonsense on which I dwelt already earlier.

The account of Eisenschmidt's alleged activity at "Bunker 1" closes with another piece of nonsense:

"I worked there for about six months, from the day I arrived until the new crematoria were put into service in May and June 1943." (p. 226)

But as is well-known, Crematoria IV and II went into operation at the end of March, Crematorium V at the beginning of April, and only Crematorium III at the end of June 1943. For Szlama Dragon the activity of the "Bunkers" ceased more logically with the commissioning of Crematorium II,¹⁷⁶ thus between late March and early April 1943.

Later, presumably in June 1943, the witness was transferred to Crematorium V. What happened to the 300 inmates of Sonderkommando 1 and 2? Gideon Greif was not interested in this by-no-means-insignificant question, and the witness said nothing in this regard.

Franciszek Piper does not explicitly explain what the fate of these inmates was – in his opinion (following Szlama Dragon) 200, not 300. But from what he writes, we can infer that they were all incorporated into the Crematorium Sonderkommando.¹⁷⁷ This was also stated by Szlama Dragon:

"[Greif] What was the difference between working at the bunkers and working at the crematoria?"

ABRAHAM: For us there was no difference at all. We did the same work, with the same group, we lived in the same block, did the same barrack room duty." (p. 148)

This is another case of witnesses' silly fantasies being projected onto the SS, trading on the false image of their illogicality or stupidity.

In her entry for 3 December 1942, Danuta Czech writes (1990, pp. 277f.):

"The approximately 300 Jewish prisoners in the special squad who dig up and burn the 107,000 bodies buried in mass graves are taken from Birkenau to the main camp by the SS. There they are led to the gas chamber in Crematorium I and killed with gas. Thus the witnesses to the corpse burning are disposed of."

This Sonderkommando was replaced by a new one established on 6 December (ibid., p. 280), among which were the Dragon brothers and Eisenschmidt. This new Sonderkommando was in charge of extracting corpses from the two "bunkers," and burning them in "cremation pits," but these tasks had also been carried out by the previous Sonderkommando since 21 September (the beginning of open-air incinerations; ibid., p. 242). But if that is so, then why was ¹⁷⁶ Statement by Szlama Dragon dated 10-11 May 1945. AGK, NTN 93, Höss Trial, Vol. 1, p. 106.

¹⁷⁷ Piper 2000, pp. 183f. After a short time, these 200 inmates were joined by another 200; the total strength of 400 was maintained until the end of 1943.

this Kommando exterminated, while the next one, which had done the same work, was merged with the crematoria staff? Wouldn't it have been more logical to exterminate the previous Sonderkommando upon liquidation of the "bunkers," and establish a new Sonderkommando just for the crematoria?

However, the alleged stupidity of the SS was even more serious. In this regard, Friedler et al. write (Friedler et al., pp. 76f.):

"Of the prisoners who were forced to work at the bunkers and mass graves between May and December 1942, only twelve men escaped the total liquidation of the labor squad – as far as is known. They managed to do so by having the presence of mind to take advantage of a favorable situation in order to get into a different unit."

They also list the names and registration numbers of these inmates: André Balbin (41796), Fredy Bauer (160403), Maurice Benroubi (51059), Simon Gotland (53980), Erko Hejblum (49269), Samuel Hejblum (57177), Arnost Ernst Rosin (29858), Maurice Shellekes (58053), Milan Spanik (36820), George van Ryk (58028), Joseph Weiss (29054), and an unknown person (36807).¹⁷⁸

Therefore, the SS allowed eleven inmates of the first Sonderkommando to "save themselves" by transferring them to other units. Again, the stupidity, of course, is not the SS's, but that of the witnesses who told such fairy tales.

According to the list "Admissions, transferred on 22 May 1942 from CC Lublin,"¹⁷⁹ the "unknown person" with the registration number 36807 was Franz Szüsz (Süss), born in Dolne-Kockovce on 12 April 1902. He is the same person who gave a long interview in 1964, which I will deal with in Chapter 10. Here, it is appropriate to anticipate what he related about the fate of the first Sonderkommando.¹⁸⁰

"This Sonderkommando, to which also I belonged and which consisted of 300 prisoners – only one prisoner remained alive, named Spanik, who lives in Bratislava, and the second is me. All the other prisoners of the Sonderkommando were planning an escape, had contacted an S.S. The latter was ready to help the Sonderkommando if it gave him half a sack of gold and jewelry. [...] The Sonderkommando, who had to undress those gassed, was ready. Half a sack was given to the S.S. When he had it well placed, he quite simply made the report that the Sonderkommando wanted to escape. On 5 December 1942, the Sonderkommando was brought to the typing pool under heavy S.S. guard. We had to write down the numbers of all the prisoners. They were taken away to Auschwitz, to the infamous Block 11. I also had several relatives in this Son-derkommando, among them my cousin from Vrutky, named Wilhelm Olitzer – and unfortunately, I had to learn the very next day from the so-called death report of the Political Department that all 298 had been shot by execution. So, as I said, only two of this Sonderkommando remained. We carried the prisoner number, I myself had Number 36807, my friend Spanik escaped because he was sick in the infirmary; he had an inmate number approx. 36820,” but the above-mentioned admissions list (covering consecutive numbers 36132 through 37131) has no Spanik (nor any similar-sounding last name).

This variant of the fable about the end of the first Sonderkommando, while keeping the strength unchanged (300 inmates) and shifting the date a bit (5 instead of 3 December 1942), introduces noteworthy literary elements. The “liquidation” was due to an escape attempt, and 298 inmates were shot in Block 11 (instead of being gassed in the Main Camp’s crematorium).

After the end of the bunkers’ operation, Eisenschmidt was transferred to Crematorium V (p. 226). Even in this regard, he does not spare anecdotes that are nonsensical or fly in the face of the orthodox narrative:

“In the spring and summer of 1944, when British and American aircraft overflew Auschwitz, we let the fire billow up the smokestacks because we hoped the pilots would notice it and bomb the crematoriums. We heard the aircraft overhead but, to our disappointment, all we heard were distant bombardments. On their way back, they flew over the camp and we were left behind to stew in our bitterness. They didn’t bomb Birkenau.” (pp. 231)

However, two bombs fell on the Birkenau Camp on 13 September 1944, one of which damaged “the railroad embankment and the connecting track to the crematoriums” (Czech 1990, p. 708).

The statement regarding flame-spewing chimneys is not only absurd, as I have already noted, but also puerile: how did the witness imagine that one could, at will and immediately, let flames “billow up the smokestacks”? This could only be done literally, that is to say, in mere words.

Here, however, one must admire Eisenschmidt’s high spirit of self-sacrifice, for if the “British and American aircraft” had actually bombed the crematorium, he would have died along with his comrades!

Later he forgot about this fable and wrote instead:

“One evening, as we sat together, American aircraft flew over the camp on their way to a bombing raid in the vicinity of Gleiwitz. Smoke was still billowing from the smokestacks of the crematoria, and we said, ‘If only those planes would drop a few bombs on the crematoria of Birkenau this time.’ We hoped so badly that it would happen.” (p. 248)

Apart from the feigned attitude of self-sacrifice, why was only “smoke” coming out of the chimneys rather than billowing flames?

Regarding the differences between Crematoria IV-V and II-III, the witness says that in the latter the gas chambers were underground, the corpses had to be brought to the furnace room with an elevator, and there:

“They loaded the bodies onto [rail] carts and took them to the furnaces just so. Each cartload of bodies was moved from furnace to furnace. The Sonderkommando men picked up the bodies, loaded them onto the stretchers, and pushed them into the furnaces. As they worked, the cart went on to the next furnace, where the process was repeated.” (p. 230)

First, it should be noted that the transport of corpses from the elevator to the furnaces by carts is contrary to dragging the corpses on the floor, as alleged by Eisenschmidt’s colleagues. Of these carts, he evidently had a rather superficial, literary knowledge. Originally, the furnace hall of Crematorium II was equipped with two corpse-introduction devices, of which the transfer cart running on rails was a part. However, these devices also served to introduce the corpse into the muffle (by means of the transfer cart, which was a constituent part of it; Mattoigno/Deana, Part 1, Unit 2, pp. 273f.). This fact was evidently unknown to Eisenschmidt, who has the corpses removed from the carts and placed on stretchers instead. He was also ignorant of another, even-more-important fact that I noted earlier: on 25 March 1943, the Central Construction Office decided to replace the corpse-introduction carts in Crematorium II with more-practical corpse stretchers. In Crematorium III, these carts were not installed, as is evident from Final Invoice No. 728 of 27 May 1943 concerning this crematorium, which has an entry reading “one corpse-introduction device each, designed as a stretcher.”¹⁸¹ Since Eisenschmidt claims to have been transferred to Crematorium V in May-June 1943, when the aforementioned device no longer existed in Crematorium II, and they had never been installed in Crematorium III to begin with, his information regarding the aforementioned “carts” is proof of his confusion caused by hearsay rather than his own experience.

Another witness story at odds with the orthodox narrative is that of the fate of the Sonderkommando members:

“If one of us got sick, a doctor came over, a professor from the University of Krakow, who examined him and wrote down his serial number. Two hours later, an ‘ambulance’ with a Red Cross emblem came and took him away. But we knew that our sick friends would be put to death. They’d get an injection of phenol straight into the heart.” (p. 236)

Like his Greek colleagues, Eisenschmidt knew nothing of the Sonderkommando doctors who treated sick inmates in a special “sick room” (Piper 2000, p. 193): the doctors Jacques Pach, Miklós Nyiszli and Charles Bendel.

The witness stated further:

¹⁸¹ RGVA, 502-1-26, p. 215.

“Only one of the fifty Sonderkommando prisoners from Holland survived” (p. 242)

In a note to the German edition, Gideon Greif points out (Greif 1995, Note 50, p. 302):

“The only name of a Dutch Sonderkommando inmate that has survived is Maurice Schellekes.”

To the English edition of his book that appeared ten years later, Greif added another name (Greif 2005, Note 39, p. 370):

“The Dutch members of the Sonderkommando whose names are known to us are Morris Schellekes (who died in Haifa some ten years ago) and George van Ryk, who now lives in Amsterdam.”

These two inmates had been deported from the Westerbork Camp on 11 August 1942, and had received Registration Numbers 58053 and 58028, respectively. The Auschwitz Museum’s online database has a certain Jozef van Ryk, born 4 December 1920 in Antwerp, with the Registration Number 58028. Nothing else is known about this inmate. Both, however, were purportedly part of the first Sonderkommando, but miraculously escaped its alleged fate, which means that they cannot have been part of the 50 Dutch Sonderkommando inmates. Who, then, were these people?

Eisenschmidt states that in 1944,

“the Sonderkommando prisoners were given living quarters in Crematoria III [IV] and IV [V]. A few of us moved to Crematoria I [II] and II [III], while others – about 120 to 160 men – had to continue living in the camp. In Crematoria I [II] and II [III], the people lived in the loft. Crematoria III [IV] and IV [V] didn’t have a loft at all; we lived on the ground floor there. After the Sonderkommando uprising, Crematorium III [IV] was totally deactivated. Only thirty men in our group survived, and it was their job to burn the bodies of the others.” (p. 233)

These statements are at odds with the orthodox storyline set forth by Franciszek Piper (Piper 2000, p. 190):

“In mid 1944, an effort was made to isolate these Sonderkommando members from other prisoners by quartering them on the crematorium grounds. The crews of Crematoria II and III were placed in the garrets of these facilities, while the crews of Crematoria IV and V and gas Bunker 2 (V) were lodged in the undressing room of crematorium IV. After the October 7 mutiny and the burning of Crematorium IV, the surviving 200 or so Sonderkommando members were quartered in the garret of Crematorium III. In connection with the planned demolition of these crematoria, the 30 prisoners assigned to operate Crematorium V were quartered in one of its rooms, while the 70 prisoners incorporated into the Abbruchkommando were sent back to the men’s camp (BIId).”

Thus, Eisenschmidt states that the Sonderkommando inmates were also housed in Crematorium V (but for Piper only in Crematorium IV), that 120-160 remained in Camp Sector BIId (none for Piper), and finally that the “survivors” of the Sonderkommando uprising numbered 30 (200 for Piper). Regarding the 30 alleged “survivors,” Eisenschmidt relates:

“One day in October 1944, a few days before the uprising began, the Germans came and announced that there’d be a roll call.”

A selection took place, and he was placed in a group of 30 people.

“They took us to a room that was fenced in. [...] As I already noted, the selection of these thirty men took place shortly before the uprising broke out. The uprising in Crematorium III [IV] began after they transferred us from Crematorium III [IV] to Crematorium IV [V]. A few men from the Sonderkommando set the building on fire.” (p. 252)

The witness returns to the theme again a little later:

“After the selection was over and the thirty men had been chosen, they wanted to transport the rest of them out of there. But they resisted, set the crematorium building on fire, and began to shoot.” (p. 253)

Thus, the revolt broke out. Piper writes instead that the selection of the 30 inmates “who would work in Crematorium V” occurred on 26 November 1944,¹⁸² not before 7 October, as Eisenschmidt states.

At this point, Eisenschmidt also introduces the fable of the two Sonderkommando doctors who attempted suicide:

“There were two Jewish doctors in my group [of 30 selected inmates]. [...] One of the doctors fell to the ground and died then and there. I asked the second doctor what it was all about, and then I figured out that he’d injected himself with poison. The second doctor had also swallowed some poison pills and spent the next three days in his death throes. He looked foggy as I talked with him, since he’d already managed to take the pills.” (pp. 253f.)

The orthodox narrative has it that two doctors – Miklós Nyiszli and Charles Sigismund Bendel, who are both inexplicably unknown to Eisenschmidt – served in the Sonderkommando in the second half of 1944. As I documented in another study,¹⁸³ one claimed to have been the only doctor in the Sonderkommando, while the other claimed to have been the chief physician. As an inevitable result, both “doctors” were ignorant of each other in their respective statements, and both told fantastic and contradictory stories.

¹⁸² Piper 2000, pp. 187f. On p. 187 erroneously appears the date “on November 26, 1945” instead of 1944.

¹⁸³ Mattoigno 2020b, see in particular Chapter 4.2.8. “Nyiszli versus Bendel,” pp. 321-333.

This fable of the suicide attempt, of which we do not know whether Bendel had invented it or merely picked it up from someone else,¹⁸⁴ was circulating in this form as early as 1947:¹⁸⁵

“In the summer of 1944, there was a revolt of the ‘Sonderkommando.’ Realizing from certain cues that they were about to be sacrificed, they refused to leave their block and burned down a part of the gas chamber. The SS machine and submachine guns, rushing in from everywhere, immediately put a stop to this attempt at revolt. The two ‘Sonderkommando’ doctors tried to commit suicide by taking a massive dose of gardenal. One of them died, the other, Dr. B.[endel], was saved due to our care. I was very pleased to learn that he had testified as a prosecution witness at the Lüneburg Trial.”

Hence, if we follow Bendel, then Nyiszli, who claimed to have been the only Sonderkommando “survivor,” committed suicide in October 1944!

As for Bendel’s own suicide attempt, it has a purely literary “reality” – another puerile device to “substantiate” the fable of the “carriers of secrets.”

¹⁸⁴ Ibid., pp. 329f: “As I have already told you, 500 men were executed with a pistol shot into the back of the neck, and I myself with my colleague, we poisoned ourselves. I was saved by the head of the crematorium, who carried me to the hospital together with my colleague, who unfortunately did not survive.”

¹⁸⁵ Ibid., p. 289. Cf. Lévy, p. 464.

9. Abraham and Szlama Dragon

Greif introduces the interview with the two Dragon brothers as follows:

“In the summer of 1993, as the documentary films on the Sonderkommando were being made, I stood with several survivors of the Sonderkommando next to the ‘White House’ [Bunker 1] in Auschwitz-Birkenau. Marcello Pezzetti, my colleague at the Center for Jewish Documentation in Milan, approached us and showed me a photocopied page from a book that quoted a 1945 testimony about the ‘Red House’ and the ‘White House.’” ‘The witness in that account was Shlomo Dragon. His testimony was recorded by a Soviet investigative commission that spent several weeks in Auschwitz immediately after the extermination camp was liberated. Shlomo Dragon was one of the most important witnesses who appeared before the committee.

On the basis of this testimony, given more than forty years earlier, my Italian colleague identified the place where we were standing as the very spot where the pits had been excavated, the pits where so many bodies had been incinerated back then. I asked him why he should base himself on written testimony when Shlomo Dragon himself was there and could speak with him personally! Shlomo, a tall, spry, rather young-looking man, stood a few meters from us. My colleague was stunned. He was sure that none of the Sonderkommando prisoners was still alive. For him, Shlomo Dragon was a testimony, not a living being.” (p. 122)

In addition to the Dragon brothers, Eliezer Eisenschmidt was also present, because Greif writes that Eisenschmidt was still grateful to the children of a Polish family who saved him in 1945; “I witnessed this at a moving encounter that took place at Birkenau in the summer of 1993.” (p. 216).

The story is important because the Italian in question was Marcello Pezzetti, Shlomo Venezia’s mentor. Several years later, on 20 November 2001, the Italian daily newspaper Corriere della Sera published an article by Gian Guido Vecchi, whose title translates to “Shoah. Hell began in a Red House,” in which Pezzetti claimed to have identified the location where Birkenau’s “Bunker 1” or “little red house” once stood. Here is the journalist’s account:

*“Marcello Pezzetti is 48 years old, has been working as a historian at the Center for Contemporary Jewish Documentation (Centro di documentazione ebraica contemporanea, CDEC) in Milan for twenty-five years, and is one of the world’s foremost experts on Auschwitz and the Shoah [sic!]. Among other things, he worked as a consultant to Roberto Benigni on the movie set of La vita è bella and to Steven Spielberg for Schindler’s List. In the 1980s, he was arrested several times because ‘the communist regime forbade the export of documents from before 1945, threatening convictions for espionage.’ Years of archival research, and suspicion became certainty. Pezzetti paces nervously, in* shirtsleeves, in his book-lined study, compulsively going through a quantity of papers, showing with his eyes wide-open the photo of an elderly gentleman in a blue T-shirt photographing the Red House: 'His name is Schloma Dragon, with his brother Abraham and Eliezer Esisenschmidt [sic]. He is one of the world's eight survivors of a Sonderkommando, the teams of inmates who worked in the chambers to take away the corpses. In the summer of 1993, leaving from Crematorium III, they accompanied me resolutely in front of the cottage. Schloma began to photograph it while crying...'"

The last sentence refers to Greif's account quoted earlier, in which, however, there is no mention of visiting this "cottage." On the other hand, one has to wonder how could Szlama Dragon have identified the location of "Bunker 1" in 1993, when he failed to identify it even in 1945, when his memory was still very fresh?

In fact, Pezzetti had reinvented the wheel here, so to say, because the precise location of the Polish house which is said to have been turned into "Bunker 1" had been indicated on 5 August 1980 by Mrs. Józefa Wisińska in a report delivered to the Auschwitz Museum, which was filed by Franciszek Piper and is currently in the collection "Statements" ("Oświadczenia", Vol. 113, pp. 77f.). In it, Mrs. Wisińska stated that before World War II her family lived in the immediate vicinity of the area that was turned into the Birkenau Camp. In 1941, the house of her uncle, Józef Harmata (and her son-in-law Gryzek), was requisitioned by the Germans and later transformed into "Bunker 1." In 1949, Mrs. Wisińska returned to the land she owned: her uncle's house ("Bunker 1") no longer existed. A new house was later built in front of it, which at the time belonged to Mr. Stanisław Czarnik. Mrs. Wisińska attached to her report a topographical sketch of the area showing the exact location of Józef Harmata's old house ("Bunker 1") and Mr. Czarnik's new house.

On 20 September 1985, Franciszek Piper took four photographs of a house, which he indicated as Mr. Czarnik's, and attached them to Mrs. Wisińska's report. One of these photographs, inventoried by the Auschwitz Museum with the archival reference "nr neg. 21225/3," shows a front view of the house in question, which is identical to the one "discovered" by Pezzetti as the site of "Bunker 1."¹⁸⁶

In other words, Pezzetti "rediscovered" in 2001 what Piper had "discovered" already in 1980 and 1985.

My examination of the Dragon brothers' statements requires some preliminary remarks. Despite Abraham Dragon's claim that he was a member of the Sonderkommando along with his brother, he testified neither at the Höss Trial, nor at the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison, nor at the Eichmann Trial in Jerusalem, nor at the Auschwitz Trial in Frankfurt, nor at the trial against ¹⁸⁶ See Mattogno 2016, Chapter 7.4., "Józefa Wisińska's Declaration on the Location of 'Bunker 1'," pp. 171f., and Chapter 8.5. "Marcello Pezzetti's 'Discovery' of 'Bunker 1'," pp. 186f.

Auschwitz architects Walter Dejaco and Fritz Ertl in Vienna. He never made an affidavit, drafted no memories, and gave no interviews. Why? In practice, before the Greif interview, he was completely unknown, so much so that Franciszek Piper never mentions him in his oft-cited exposition of the alleged extermination methods at Auschwitz (Piper 2000). Why did Abraham Dragon rediscover himself as an “eyewitness” only in 1993? Greif either did not have the curiosity or the will to ask his interviewee any of these fundamental questions.

As for Szlama/Shlomo Dragon, in his statement to the Soviet Commission, he did not mention his brother at all, not even in reference to registration:¹⁸⁷

“On 8 December 1942 I, together with other inmates of the camp, were tattooed – [I received] the number 80359 on my left arm – and were housed in Barracks No. 14.”

In his Polish deposition, he made three vague references to his brother:¹⁸⁸

“My brother and I declared that we were tailors by profession, and [we] were also assigned to this group established then by Moll and his comrades.”

“Among the inmates of the Sonderkommando who left Oświęcim were, among others, Zawek Chrzan from Gostynin, Samuel – French, Leibel from Grodno, Lemko from Czernow Bór, Dawid Nencel from Rypin, Moszek and Jankel Weingarten from Poland, Sender from Berlin, Moryc from Greece, Abraham Dragon from Żeromin, Serge – French /Blockältester/, Abo from Grodno, Becker Berek from Łuna, Kuzyn from Radom, and others whose names I don’t remember.

Currently I plan to settle in Żeromin and begin work in my profession. I assume that my brother will also return [there], and we will work together.”

In the stories they told Greif, the two brothers shared their alleged experiences in the Sonderkommando, and Abraham often intervened to provide further details. His brother’s previous silence about him is thus inexplicable and probably reflects the fact that the story of Abraham’s role in the Sonderkommando for a long time was not yet literarily ready.

Szlama is considered the predominant source of information about the Birkenau “bunkers” during the period from December 1942 to March/April 1943. Piper mentions him more than twenty times, and sketches of the two “bunkers” Szlama presented were the basis upon which Engineer Eugeniusz Nosal drew his cross sections of these facilities, which were attached to Szlama’s deposition of 10-11 May 1945.¹⁸⁹

But what are the credentials of this witness, what is the value of his account?

It should be stated first of all that he was very young at the time (“I was seventeen,” p. 134). Secondly, as I will show later, he worked only one day at “Bunker 2” in 1942-1943, and only two days in 1944 when it was purportedly reactivated (“I myself worked there, I think, two days,” AGK, p. 106; “I worked there two days straight,” p. 148), yet never at all at “Bunker 1.”

It must therefore be assumed that he had an exceptional talent of observation and memorization, because in a single day, although he was shocked by the sight of the massacre (“Almost all of us went into shock,” p. 133), he was able to observe everything very-carefully and fix it indelibly in his mind. Three years later, he was therefore able to give a meticulous description of “Bunker 2” and its “cremation pits.” But even so, from a historiographical point of view, his “eyewitness” account would be exhausted with this description. Everything in his account about the operations at “Bunker 1,” in which he never participated, and also “Bunker 2,” where he was a mere short-term observer, necessarily comes from hearsay – or as the orthodoxy would insist, from his fellow Sonderkommando members who would have been the actual eyewitnesses. But this does not detract from the fact that it is still all mere hearsay. Yet even those parts of Szlama Dragon’s testimony for which he claims to have been a direct witness are historiographically unusable and historically unreliable because of the incredible nonsense contained in his statement of 26 February 1945 as recorded by the Soviets, and the irreducible contradictions it presents with respect to his deposition of 10-11 May 1945 as recorded by Polish authorities, as I document in an earlier study (Mattoigno 2022b). In this chapter, I will examine other aspects of the account given by the Dragon brothers, and I will in particular juxtapose what they told Greif in the early 1990s to what Szlama deposed in 1945.

Both brothers arrived at Auschwitz on 7 December 1942 with a transport of 2,500 people (p. 128), although Czech claims that this transport arrived on 6 December (Czech 1990, p. 280). At the time, black propaganda about Auschwitz had already been circulating in Poland for months, yet Abraham and Szlama Dragon knew nothing of it, so much so that they volunteered (!) for this transport (p. 127).

I have already dwelt earlier on their alleged assignment to the Sonderkommando.

As to the brothers’ alleged mnemonic feats, Greif stated the following – one does not know whether naively or maliciously:

“Both brothers have amazing powers of recall. They furnished me with many details that others had long since managed to forget.” (p. 124)

This is rather strange, because 21 years earlier, in 1972, at the 26th hearing of the Vienna trial against Auschwitz architects Walter Dejaco and Fritz Ertl on 2 March 1972, Szlama, after having confused Crematorium I with “Bunker 2” (!) the day before, was forced to admit: “Today, after 30 years, I can no longer remember...” (Pressac 1989, p. 172).

The Dragon brothers’ “amazing powers of recall” during Greif’s interview was the result of the fact that they had both reread Szlama’s Polish deposition of 10-11 May 1945, with or without Greif’s complicity. I remind the reader that the interview took place in Birkenau, and that the minutes of the 1945 deposition are preserved in the archives of the Auschwitz Museum. This is not mere conjecture, but a fact, because they either read or recited from memory (now that would have been “amazing powers of recall”!) entire passages of the deposition in virtually the same words, as I will show below.

Nevertheless, the Dragon brothers allowed themselves literary variations on secondary themes.

In the statement made by Szlama Dragon to the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on 26 February 1945 Szlama Dragon stated:¹⁹⁰

“After working one day in Gas Chamber No. 2, I became ill, so I was assigned to cleaning and other work in Barracks No. 2. I worked in the barracks until May 1943, and then I was assigned to the job of collecting bricks from the brick basements and brick half-basements that had been blown up by the Germans. I worked there until February 1944;”

In his Polish deposition of 10-11 May 1945, he made no mention of his illness:

“In the evening of the first day, after the end of work, we were brought back to the camp. We were not placed in Block 14, from which we had been sent to work, but in Block 2.” (AGK, pp. 104f.)

“In 1943, we were transferred from the Women’s Camp to the BIId Camp, and housed there first in Block 13, then in Block 11. In the fall of the same year, I was again employed in the Sonderkommando. In between my work at the bunkers [and his reassignment to the Sonderkommando] I was employed in the Abbruchkommando [Demolition Squad].” (AGK, p. 107)

Incidentally, Szlama Dragon’s transfer to the Demolition Squad after the end of activities at “Bunker 2” belies the story of the “carriers of secrets” who were to be promptly exterminated so that they would not reveal the “truth.”

In the interview with Greif, Shlomo, backed by his brother, invented another story:

“I told my brother, ‘I can’t keep doing this work.’ After the whole place was cleaned up, I took bits of glass from a broken bottle that was lying there, slashed my arm, and said that I couldn’t continue to work.” (p. 140)

He was transported to Block 2, where the Sonderkommando inmates were housed, and here is the continuation of the story:

¹⁹⁰ GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 17.

“[Greif] Had you finished the work by that time?

Shlomo: No, not the whole thing. I slashed myself, the blood spurted, and I said, ‘I can’t work anymore.’

[Greif] Where did you do that?

Shlomo: There, at the pit.” (p. 140)

“[Greif] Did you lose lots of blood?

Shlomo: Yes, lots and lots. [...]

[Greif] Did all of this happen on the first day?

Abraham: Yes, the first day that we worked there.

Shlomo: That evening we were taken back to the camp – not to Block 1, where we’d gone to work from, but to Block 2.” (p. 141) “Abraham: The block was divided into four wings, and two men in each wing were assigned to barrack room duty.

Shlomo: The ill and the weak were chosen for this work. Luckily for me, I belonged to the group of injured and weak people, so I was chosen. I asked them to assign my brother to barrack room duty, too.

[Greif] Under those circumstances, it must have been important for you to place your brother in the barrack room detail, too.

Shlomo: Yes, I was willing to sacrifice everything for that goal. In all, eight men were chosen for this work, so we stayed behind in Block 2 and didn’t go out for work.

[Greif] On the second day, if I understand correctly, you stayed in the block while the other two hundred men went out to work?

Abraham: Yes.” (p. 143)

Keep in mind that according to Eisenschmidt, who claims to have been a member of the same Sonderkommando as the Dragon brothers, sick inmates were killed by “injection of phenol straight into the heart,” while Szlama Dragon, who was sick or wounded, was not only not killed, but was promoted to room duty, and even managed to get his brother Abraham to have the same assignment!

Abraham told a no-less-astonishing story:

“When we worked at the pits, one of the guards beat up one of our members. We stopped working and said that we wouldn’t continue. It was like a mini-uprising. What happened then? They summoned high-ranking officers right away. A man named Hössler came over and asked us what it was all about. We said that if it weren’t enough that we were doing bone-breaking labor, we were also suffering from beatings by the SS men. They could kill us for all we cared, but we wouldn’t go on working that way. Hössler calmed us down, said that we wouldn’t be flogged anymore, and immediately ordered them to give us extra food.” (p. 142)

So this mini-uprising of the Sonderkommando was not suppressed in blood, but SS Oberscharführer Franz Hössler, who was the head of inmate labor deployment at the time, meekly accepted the demands of the insurgents! Right after the war, brother Szlama did not even hint fleetingly at this heroic act. According to him, the only incident where an SS man was confronted was this one (AGK, p. 103):

“Moll ordered us to transport these corpses from inside the house to the courtyard in front of the door. We began to work in this manner, four of us carrying one corpse. This irritated Moll, [who] rolled up his sleeves and threw a corpse in front of the door into the courtyard. When we declared in spite of this lesson that we could not manage to work like this, he divided us up into groups of two.”

And this is how Abraham escaped a “selection” of 200 Sonderkommando inmates who were to be sent to Majdanek, presumably to be killed there:

“Then I got sick. The SS men wanted to cover up the fact that not a single member of this group would be coming back, so they told me, ‘Sick people don’t join. You have to stay here. There we need men who can work.’ I said I’d stay only if my brother could stay, too. So Shlomo stayed in the block, too, and that’s how we survived.” (p. 147)

I have already referred to Eisenschmidt’s statements about the alleged fate of the sick, but Piper also writes that in 1943 “twenty or more” Sonderkommando inmates were “injected with phenol each week after falling ill” (Piper 2000, p. 184). Abraham Dragon, on the other hand, was miraculously saved precisely because he was ill (but it is unclear why Szlama was also saved).

On the fate of those selected, Abraham added:

“A little later we heard that the people who’d been sent away were murdered in the crematorium in Lublin. They took them to Lublin in a sealed railroad car, and gassed them to death somehow – I don’t know exactly how.” (p. 147)

Actually, according to the German edition, Abraham is quoted as saying:

“They had been taken to Lublin – locked up in a railroad car, and somehow – I don’t exactly know – gas was introduced.” (Greif 1995, p. 82)

So thanks to Abraham Dragon we know that, in addition to imaginary gas vans, the SS also used railroad cars to gas people!

When it comes to life-saving miracles, Shlomo was just as lucky: during his escape from the evacuation column from Auschwitz, “No one shot at me at all.” Greif asked him:

“How could this be? How did you explain it to yourself?

Shlomo: It was simply a miracle; I can’t explain it any other way.” (p. 177)

As I anticipated earlier, the Dragon brothers’ “amazing powers of recall” depended on the careful, but not-careful-enough, rereading of Szlama’s deposition of 10-11 May 1945, as is clear from the following examples.

Interview (pp. 134f.):

“It was a little house with a thatched roof. Its windows were blocked with stones. On the main door was a sign that said, ‘Caution, High Voltage, Danger of Death.’ The house was divided into four small rooms. There were two windows in the wall of the largest room. Each of the other three rooms had only one window. The windows had wooden shutters. Each room had a separate entrance. You could see the sign ‘Caution, High Voltage, Danger of Death’ only when the door was closed. When the door was open, you saw the sign, ‘To Bath and Disinfection Room.’ The people who were sent there to die, the ones who were in the room, saw the second sign that was hanging on the door, the one that said, ‘To Bath and Disinfection Room.’”

Deposition (AGK, pp. 103, 104):

“We were taken to a forest, where there was a masonry cottage, covered by a thatched roof. The windows were bricked up. On the door leading into this house was fixed a sheet-metal plate with the inscription ‘Hochspannung – Lebensgefahr’ [High Voltage – Mortal Danger].”

“This house inside was divided by cross walls into four rooms. [...] In the first room, the largest one, there were two small windows in the wall. The other three had one small window each. These windows were closed by wooden shutters. Each room had a separate entrance. On the entrance door was posted a sign, which I mentioned earlier, with the inscription ‘Hochspannung – Lebensgefahr’. This inscription was only visible when the entrance door was closed. When the door was open, this inscription could not be seen, but one could see the second inscription ‘Zum baden [sic]’ [To the bath]. Those gassed [sic] who were inside the chamber could see another inscription placed on the exit door of the chamber. This sign read ‘Zur Desinfektion’ [To Disinfection...]. Each chamber had a separate exit door.”

Interview (p. 139):

“Apart from Bunker 2, there was Bunker 1, half a kilometer away. It was also a brick house with two gas chambers. These chambers had only two doors, and each door had one opening through which enough gas was thrown for one chamber. Next to Bunker 1 was a granary and two huts that were used as undressing halls. The pits were a long way away, so they had to use trolleys.”

Deposition (AGK, p. 104):

“Apart from it, at a distance of about half a kilometer, there was another chamber that was called Bunker No. 1. It also was a brick house, but it consisted of only two chambers, which together could hold less than 2,000 undressed people. These rooms had only an entrance door and a small window each. In the vicinity of Bunker 1 was a small barn and 2 barracks. The pits were located far away, and tracks for carts led to them.”

Interview (p. 137):

“We removed the ashes from the pits but only forty-eight hours after the bodies were burned. There were still bits of bone in the ashes. We found skulls, kneecaps, and long bones there.”

Deposition (AGK, pp. 105f.):

“We emptied the ash pits generally about 48 hours after cremation. In the ashes, there were remnants of bones; you could see skulls, knees, and long bones.”

Interview (pp. 135f.):

[Greif] How far was the cottage from the hut?

Shlomo: Maybe thirty to fifty meters, [...]

[Greif] Where were the pits?

Shlomo: Not far from the house. [...]

On the other side of the house were four huge pits, twenty meters long, three meters deep, and seven to eight meters wide.”

Deposition (AGK, p. 103):

“Two wooden shacks were located at a distance of about 30-40 meters from that little house. On the other side there were 4 pits, with dimensions of 30 meters long, 7 meters wide and 3 meters deep.”

Interview (p. 137):

“After we took all the bodies out, we had to clean the house, wash the floor with water, spread sawdust, and whitewash the walls.”

Deposition (AGK, p. 104):

“After all the corpses had been removed from the house, we had to clean it thoroughly, wash the floor with water, then sprinkle it with sawdust and whitewash the walls.”

Shlomo also described in the same words as in the deposition the alleged scenario after the gassing and the anecdote of a “baby” found alive and then brutally killed by Moll (p. 136; AGK, p. 105).

However, he also allowed himself some liberties: in the deposition “Bunker 1” had two barracks, yet in the interview only one “cottage.” Another detail never before mentioned by Shlomo is the presence of snow:

“It was snowing as we marched toward the forest [to “Bunker 1”].” (p. 132)

He later confirmed that the victims had to walk from this “cottage” to “Bunker 1” “in the snow” (p. 135), which was quite normal for Auschwitz in late December. But then, how could the four cremation pits (measuring 20 m × 7-8 m × 3 m) function perfectly with the ground and the firewood snow-covered and frozen, while snow was falling on them?

The witness Süss even stated in his 1964 deposition¹⁹¹ that in the building where the victims waited for their death there were, “mainly in winter, also totally healthy young prisoners who were designated for gassing only because they could not do any work in the terrain in winter.

[Question by Meir Lamed] There was no work in winter?

[Süss] No, everything was frozen.”

After the “bunkers” ceased their activities in April 1943 at the latest, the Sonderkommando inmates – 200 men (p. 137) – joined the Sonderkommando of the crematoria, as I anticipated earlier, rather than being exterminated as dangerous “carriers of secrets,” as orthodox logic would have it. “Towards the middle of 1944” (p. 148), Shlomo and Abraham were assigned to Crematorium IV (they said nothing about the fate of the other 198 Sonderkommando members):

“Crematoria I, II, III, and IV [II-V] were already working by then. Sometimes we were called out for work at Crematorium III [IV], but not for long periods of time.” (p. 149)

Abraham clarified later:

“We worked together at Crematorium IV [V]. We lived at Crematorium III [IV]. We worked at Crematorium III [IV] only when there was lots of work.” (p. 157)

Therefore, they must have been perfectly familiar with Crematoria IV and V, but some of their statements about them cause great perplexity:

“[Greif] Were the chimneys of Crematoria III [IV] and IV [V] tall?

Abraham: Yes, but not as tall as those of Crematoria I [II] and II [III]. You could see the chimneys of Crematoria I [II] and II [III] from far away.” (p. 150)

But as I already indicated earlier, the heights of the chimneys – 15.46 m for Crematoria II-III and 16 m for Crematoria IV-V – made their heights basically indistinguishable to an observer standing on the ground.

“Shlomo: The fire under the furnaces was stoked with coke or some other form of coal. The furnaces themselves were positioned farther up. The furnace doors were also higher. The lid was very heavy and shaped like a semicircle.” (p. 94)

In reality, the Topf 8-muffle cremation furnace consisted of two groups of four muffles separated by four gas generators where “the fire was stoked,” hence not under, but next to the muffles. Each generator served a pair of muffles connected to each other. Only the upper half of the muffle doors were “semicircles,” and very heavy were not the doors, but rather the vertically sliding rectangular muffle closures (Muffelabsperrschieber; Pressac called them “guillotine-like”).

Shlomo then also adds nonsense about how the stretchers were used to load the muffles:

“We had to arrange the bodies in groups of three: two of them lying parallel, their heads next to each other, and the third body lying with its feet next to the heads of the other two.

By the time the third body was laid on the stretcher, half of the two other bodies were already in the furnace and they began to catch fire. The heat was so great that their hands and feet shriveled and their limbs lurched upward and contracted quickly. This made it hard to place the third body on the stretcher, so we had to move quickly.” (pp. 156f.)

This brief text contains numerous absurdities:

- It would have been impossible to add another body on top of two bodies already lying on the stretcher while that stretcher was already half-way inserted into the muffle.
- It is also wrong that corpses “catch fire” when inserted into a cremation muffle, because first the majority of the water contained in a human body has to evaporate before the combustible tissue can ignite, which takes many minutes.
- The stretchers used at Auschwitz were only some 40 cm wide, so it would have been physically impossible to place two bodies side by side, with “their heads next to each other” (unambiguously “nebeneinander” – “side by side” in the German edition, 1995, p. 94).
- The doors of the Auschwitz-type muffles were too small to allow more than two bodies stacked on top of each other to be inserted into a muffle together.
- Piling up multiple bodies inside a muffle designed to contain only one corpse at a time would have led to a multitude of thermotechnical problems making any successful cremation difficult, if not near-impossible.
- To this long list of technical nonsense, Shlomo adds the physically impossible nonsense, widespread among witnesses, that the corpses raised their limbs in reaction to the heat.

In his Polish deposition, he had stated in this regard (AGK, p. 108):

“We placed the corpses on the stretchers in this way: when the first one lay with its head forward, we placed the second one with its head back. In each furnace we loaded three corpses. When we loaded the third corpse, those [the two corpses] introduced earlier were already burning. I saw that the arms of these corpses rose, then the legs rose. Besides, we were proceeding very quickly, and I could not accurately observe the entire burning process. We had to hurry, because if the extremities of these already burning corpses rose strongly, we had difficulties getting the third corpse into the furnace [=muffle].”

No chemical-physical law explains or even allows the alleged phenomenon of rising limbs.

During the interview, the witness no longer remembered that at war's end he had claimed that the two corpses on the stretcher were positioned head-to-toe, one head first, the other feet first (so not with faces next to each other, but with face near feet), and that the first two bodies were already in the muffle when the third was loaded with a separate loading step.

Shlomo also took from the Polish deposition the absurdity of the length of the cremation process, using almost the same words.

Deposition (AGK, p. 108): "The cremation took 15-20 minutes. After that time, we opened the doors of the furnaces and introduced more corpses."

Interview (p. 157): "The fire [=cremation] lasted fifteen to twenty minutes. Then the lid was opened and additional bodies were placed in the furnace."

At times, however, he tried to smooth over the blatant nonsense he had uttered in his deposition, as in his account of the extermination of the Hungarian Jews, where he had originally claimed that some 300,000 Hungarian Jews had been killed in Crematorium V alone:

Deposition (AGK, p. 110): "This work lasted for the months of May and June. Based on my observations, I calculate that approximately 300,000 Hungarian Jews were cremated in Crematorium No. V during these two months. These people were driven to Crematorium V on foot, directly from the Brzezinka unloading ramp." (Emphases added)

Interview (p. 163): "The work continued in May and June 1944. As I figured it, about 300,000 Hungarian Jews were murdered during those months."

In one case, Abraham's memory was even more "amazing" than his brother's, that is, he remembered a little "better" than what his brother remembered when making his Polish deposition at war's end. When speaking about the claimed gas chamber inside Crematoria IV and V, both Shlomo and Abraham consistently use the singular "gas chamber" in the German edition of Greif's interview (1995, pp. 88-91; the English edition has a few plurals, pp. 152-154), until Greif points out this mistake, after which both brothers suddenly switch gears:

"[Greif] In fact, there were two gas chambers, one for a large number of people and a smaller one for smaller transports."

Shlomo: Yes, they used two rooms as gas chambers and one as an undressing hall. Each gas chamber had its own door. From the undressing hall a corridor led straight to the door of the large gas chamber, and around the corner was the door to the small gas chamber. The large gas chamber was twice as large as the small one.

Abraham: At first there were three rooms; afterwards, toward the end, they added a fourth. The first could hold 1,400 people, the second about 700, the third about 500, and the fourth about 150.” (p. 154)

In the Polish deposition, Szlama had asserted (AGK, p. 107):

“When everyone had undressed, they were pushed naked into the gas chamber. At first, there were 3 gas chambers, but later a fourth was installed. The first could hold 1,500, the second 800, the third 600, and the fourth 150 people. From the undressing room, people passed into the rooms through a narrow corridor.”

Hence, Shlomo claimed two homicidal gas chambers, yet for Abraham there were initially three, and later even four, which is precisely the version of Szlama’s Polish deposition, but the capacity claimed by Szlama is a little larger: a total of 3,050 people versus 2,750.

Compared to his Polish deposition, Shlomo made an important admission (which he had previously limited to the period between the end of his work at the bunkers and his reassignment to the Sonderkommando):

“When the transports got to be fewer, we were drafted for the Abbruchkommando, the ‘demolition detail.’

[Greif] Are you willing to explain?

Shlomo: In the town of Oswiecim there were old houses, and to keep us busy all the time they’d bring us there for work. I also asked the Kapo to give me that job because there were chances to escape from there. Once we were there, we looked for places we could escape to but we didn’t find any way to do it and anywhere to go.

[Greif] What work did they make you do there?

Abraham: Knocking down old buildings. [...]

Shlomo: Whenever there were no transports, I was also assigned to the demolition groups.” (p. 157)

The Demolition Squad operated not only in the town of Auschwitz, but within the camp’s entire area of interest. It is obvious that assigning Sonderkommando members, even if only temporarily, to the demolition squad – where contact with other inmates was inevitable and the chances of escape greater – was certainly not the best way for the SS to contain their “terrible secret” of Auschwitz. Again we are confronted with the fable of the SS’s stupidity, which earlier, precisely to avoid contact with other inmates in the camp, had quartered the Sonderkommando members in the isolated Block No. 13:

“[Abraham] The blocks were totally sealed and were meant exclusively for the Sonderkommando and the Strafkommando. The block had a yard that was closed in to keep the Sonderkommando totally separate.” (p. 147)

Abraham's survival was no-less-miraculous than his brother's. During the uprising of 7 October 1944, he was in Crematorium V, and was wounded in the leg with "dumdum bullets" (p. 173). He fell to the ground, but instead of being killed as "more than five hundred escaped prisoners" (p. 172), he was taken by an SS man "to the camp infirmary," where he was treated by a Jewish surgeon from Warsaw. And here is the second miracle:

"I recovered slowly. Then one day they did a Selektion in the hospital. The Germans asked each patient why he had been put there. When my turn came I said, that I was a member of the Sonderkommando, and then they said, 'You stay here.'" (p. 173)

Another extraordinary case of reverse "selection"!

I have already reported on Shlomo's miraculous escape during the evacuation march from the camp. Abraham, on the other hand, was taken to Mauthausen, together with the group of Sonderkommando inmates I mentioned earlier, but no attempt to identify them was made there, as many of his colleagues stated:

"The trip ended at Mauthausen. There we spent another night on our feet until we were placed in a shack.

When it came my turn, I saw that some of the prisoners had been marked with the letters 'KL.' I was sure they'd take me to the crematorium, because I'd been marked with those letters too. Instead, the Germans sent the people who had them to the infirmary. There we lay, without being given anything that could be described as food. Once a day we got a little soup, that's all. I spent about three months there." (pp. 174f.)

And this was the third miracle.

10. Franz Süss

The witness Süss (Szüsz is the spelling of his surname he used in Hungary) arrived at Auschwitz “one Sunday, 26 Mai” 1942. His testimony, which is virtually unknown, is important because it reveals what the actual origins and tasks of the Sonderkommando were. I reproduce the essential parts of his lengthy narrative:¹⁹²

“The next day, the stronger ones were selected, including me, and were assigned to a so-called ‘Sonderkommando.’ In Birkenau itself, there were no crematoria at that time, and the daily deaths, which amounted to 2-300 (in the meantime new transports came day and night, from France, from Slovakia, 1000, 1500 each, at that time still mainly men), and of course the mass mortality began already after one week. We, the Sonderkommando, when we asked the Slovak workers there (prisoners) what the work was, they said ‘the work is unpleasant, but you will have the advantage of getting bread’. The hunger was indescribable; the terror on the part of the kapos and the S.S. was unbearable. [...]

Of course, on the very first day this work consisted of carrying about 300 corpses on our backs from the so-called infirmary to a narrow-gauge railway, and then the Russian prisoners led this train in a direction unknown to us. After a week, our Sonderkommando was again divided into 40 inmates with a Jewish Kapo, who was appointed at that time because he ranked higher than the others as Kapo, named Kühlfass from Podoli, Slovakia. [...]

Then we went to work, toward the narrow-gauge railway, where they took the bodies. There we got the instruction from the S.S. ‘There you will dig a trench, length measuring 400 meters, width of 10 meters, and a depth of 3 meters’. Every ten meters a strip was left where one could go through, No [Slovak word: but] we dug that, dug, in the meantime the rain came, the soil was clayey and the water could not seep through. And because of these rainfalls, the water stood there up to one and a half meters high; we had to continue digging and working despite the water[,] then finally they saw that this is useless. Pumps with great power came and pumped out the water, and we continued to work. The next day we saw a white house, perhaps could have served once as a forestry house. Next to it was a small young forest; nothing was stirring; but from time to time we saw a S.S.; he went back and forth – and once we got two kettles with soup from the kitchen, and carried it to this so-called white house, the forestry house. There, under the supervision of the S.S., we handed over these two kettles of soup. There I recognized this Kapo with these 39 prisoners, this Kühlfass, but unfortunately I could not speak with him. This repeated itself daily, for we brought them food from the Birkenau kitchen. Once, however, I succeeded, the S.S. [man] was a bit distant – and asked in Hungarian what they were actually doing there. Quite depressed, he answered me, ‘Don’t ask[‘]. Again and again it repeated itself, when the rest were [sic], I learned that the first gas experiments in Birkenau are made in a wooden barracks next to it.

Then we also learned more. The barracks stood there; a part of it was clad with lead plates inside, and there these experiments were actually made. When we finished a trench that was, as I said, 400 meters long – we were 300 at this work – when this trench was finished and we came back in the morning for further work – there was already something inside the trench. We couldn’t see what it was, because it was covered with 20 centimeters of soil. We had the duty to raise these 20 centimeters with another [layer of] 30 [cm]. We did it for 10, 12 days – when one day we came and found in this pit naked women, children, men – some of them still alive. We had to continue our work, driven by the S.S. with sticks and blows, as if there was nothing there, and we covered the corpses with soil. One desperate act after another followed. Many could not stand it with their nerves; I myself was totally shaken, and made up my mind that I must somehow escape with my life, so as to no longer take part. Meanwhile, new transports were arriving daily – thousands, even tens of thousands, and barracks were being built at a furious pace to accommodate the arrivals. We had continued the work. In this one trench, dead bodies were piled up, a second one was dug, a third and fourth one was measured out. In the meantime, however, as a result of the impossible hygienic conditions, without water, without washing facilities, a typhus epidemic broke out, which raged to such an extent that 4-600 prisoners died every day out of a population of about 10-12,000. This, of course, did not spare the S.S. guards either – and when some of them died as well, drinking-water facilities were quickly created; we were even given boiled swamp water to drink, a washroom was built. We were obligated to clean ourselves from the frequent lice, etc., got two hours off every day for this. [...]”

“I got typhus. At that time we prisoners all had to undress daily and have ourselves checked in the typhus camp. This was done by the S.S. and the camp doctors, some of whom were also prisoners themselves, in such a way that they touched the belly. Whoever had a warm belly, was loaded onto a car in the evening as a typhus suspect and radically killed. I had typhus, but had....

L. [Meir Lamed, interrogator] That is, at that time the gas was already...

S.[üss] No, only on a trial basis. There was no gas yet, only on an experimental basis in this barracks.

L. The people were shot?

S. The people died a so-called natural death, that is, they were beaten to death, and most of them starved to death. Less calories, plus work. The result is always death.” (pp. 7f.)

In order to pass the typhus belly-check, Süss, put cloths soaked in cold water on his belly, so that his belly appeared cool during the examination, although he was sick.

“And so, after ten days of fasting and high fever, I got rid of the typhus; I had an appetite again. [...]” (p. 8)

Fourteen inmates worked in the “writing room,” all of whom died of typhus.

“In spite of the fact that the Sonderkommando was a locked-up unit, and this prisoner, the so-called report writer in the writing room had no other way out, he too had to come to the Sonderkommando and asked those who could read and write German perfectly, even knew some Slavic languages, to come forward.”

Süss stepped forward and was assigned to the writing room, along with 13 other typists (pp. 6f.).

“I did this work in Birkenau for two and a half years, that is, from August 1942 until 18 January 1945, when the camp was evacuated. [...]”

I will again formulate the question: are you interested in the share of Slovak Jews in the Sonderkommando and information that I received about the work of the Sonderkommando?”

This is followed by the passage on the liquidation of the Sonderkommando that I quoted earlier, which continues thus:

“Later, another Sonderkommando was formed, but it already consisted of Polish, French, Dutch – in short, of European Jews. But the Kapos were not Jews. The stoker himself, who was considered the most important person, because back then the crematoria were already operating – he was a German professional criminal named Kaminsky from Hanover, in his civilian profession a stoker; they then did this tremendously difficult work in the crematoria for quite a long time. By the way, these dead whom we had buried in this pit, as I mentioned at the beginning, numbering 6000 [corrected above in pen: sixty thousand]; they were then taken out of the pits when the crematoria were built, which was about October 1942; an unprecedented stench lay over Birkenau for several kilometers, and all the corpses were then burned again. These pits, from which 60,000 were extracted, were then immediately filled in, little trees were put in, as if nothing had happened there.” (p. 13)

“Now the question: as a prisoner scribe, I had the opportunity to talk to the block scribes of all blocks, including those of the Sonderkommando. I always asked them about the latest things. Which transports were coming, from where, etc. On these occasions I received news, I myself was totally apathetic at that time, I kept the ledgers; there were 13 [scribes], heard these news [...].”

And so I heard from the Sonderkommando Kapo, who was a Polish Jew whose name I don’t know [...]. He told me: ‘Today was a big day in the crematorium.’ ‘What?’ ‘Himmler visited us.’ ‘So what?’ ‘He looked at the work, even the gassings, through an observation window, and afterwards, when he saw that actually only prisoners were taking the corpses to the crematorium, he said 'this sacred work should be done by S.S. [men].' Got into his car and drove away. This visit was repeated. Eichmann.

L. You were talking about Himmler, weren't you?

S. That was Himmler. Then Eichmann came as well. Allegedly he was there in 1943, and accepted without any special remarks, as a matter of course, all the work at the crematoria. He was accompanied by the long-time camp commandant of Birkenau, Schwarzhuber, with his retinue.

I moreover heard about a block clerk who was actually walled in; through a window [he] took over the jewelry, exactly weighed in kilogram balls. Every week, about 30 kilograms of gold (taken from the prisoners) were weighed out into balls and sent to Berlin, to the National Bank. Our prisoner, who weighed out and melted the gold, was called Feldmann and came from Trentschin Topla [...].

Now perhaps a statement by Mengele, which I heard myself. Once more a selection was made in the so-called infirmary, to which about 3000 [added above in pen: three thousand] inmates fell victim. It was in the spring of 1943; it was one of the largest numbers gassed at that time." (pp. 13f.)

"It should be quite interesting to note that in the years 1942 to 1943, those incapable of work were also gassed, regardless of their race, i.e. also Aryans, including Germans. [...] I estimate the number of non-Jews who were gassed in this way at 1200." (p. 15)

"The capacity, if I may so express myself, was 24,000 dead in 24 hours at that time. The gassing in itself had unlimited possibilities, but the crematoria had a maximum capacity of 20 to 24,000. They helped themselves by simply making pits next to the crematoria, pouring gasoline on the corpses, and setting them on fire – later everything burned automatically." (p. 17)

This account contains an obvious real core, onto which the witness crudely tried to superimpose the confusing black propaganda to which he had been exposed from hearsay. In late May/early June 1942, the Sonderkommando had the sole task of burying the bodies of inmates who had died "naturally" (of disease, starvation, hardship), because mass extermination was not yet taking place in Auschwitz at that time (keep in mind that, according to Danuta Czech, this mass murder is said to have begun in "Bunker 1" on 20 March; Czech 1990, p. 146). However, the number of deaths adduced by Süss before the typhus epidemic reached its peak (200-300 in June/July 1942) is exaggerated: the average daily mortality in June was 127, the average daily mortality in July 142 (see Mattogno 2019, pp. 250f.). Even during August 1942, when the camp experienced the highest monthly mortality in its history (8,800 deaths), the witness's figures are greatly exaggerated: 400-600 per day as against a daily average of 277; his daily figure corresponds only to the peak numbers that occurred only on a few days (408 deaths on the 15th, 482 on the 18th, 517 on the 20th, 542 on the 19th of August; ibid., p. 252).

The shapes of the four pits that were dug at the time by the Sonderkommando can still be seen on air photos taken on 31 May 1944 (see Mattogno 2016a, Docs. 29f., p. 173), just outside perimeter of the Birkenau Camp, about 160 meters north of Crematorium V, but Süß disproportionately exaggerated their length (400 meters): the first two pits (starting from the west) were about 100 meters long, the other two about 130 meters. The width of each pit was about 10 meters. The depth of 3 meters is also exaggerated, because as explained earlier, the groundwater stood on average just over a meter below the ground surface, and that is precisely why the pits had such a large surface area.

The mention of a “narrow-gauge railway” is framed within this “normal” burial activity, without any reference to “Bunker 1” (for Szlama Dragon, four pits were located 500 meters away from this “bunker,”¹⁹³ which was to justify the use of a narrow-gauge railway). But from Süß’s perspective, this “narrow-gauge railway” was completely unnecessary, because the aforementioned air photos clearly show a road branching off from the road that bordered the east side of Birkenau Construction Sector III and reaching all the way to the four pits. This railway is therefore merely a reflection of black propaganda.

The account of the excavation of the first pit, filled with rainwater “one and a half meters high” and the “Pumps with great power” used to empty the pit puts Filip Müller’s related narrative into a real-world context, who also reported that the water was extracted with a “power pump,” although he states that the pit were flooded by “ground-water,” which is more likely than mere rainwater (Müller 1979, pp. 12-24). Müller’s homicidal context – the pit was intended for the bodies of Jews gassed in the Main Camp’s crematorium, which had to be buried following the (alleged) damage to the furnaces by a fire – is clearly based on a false narrative (see Mattogno 2021a, pp. 23-29).

Süß’s claimed number of bodies exhumed from the pits is at odds both with the orthodox number: 60,000 versus 107,000 (Czech 1990, p. 277), and with the likely number based on the likely depth and packing density of the pits as visible on air photos: 60,000 versus some 10,000 to 20,000 (Rudolf 2020a, pp. 119).

Of the two “bunkers,” Süß knew absolutely nothing. Evidently based on his convoluted recollections of what he had heard and read, he poorly improvised: he saw “a white house, perhaps could have served once as a forestry house,” and reiterated “white house, the forestry house.” As is known, the term “White House” is one of the terms used in the orthodox narrative to describe “Bunker 2,” but for Süß, this building was not a homicidal gas chamber. Indeed, he learned “that the first gas experiments in Birkenau are made in a wooden barracks next to it. Then we also learned more. The barracks stood there; a part of it was clad with lead plates inside, and there these experiments were actually made.” This means that the “barracks,” which in the orthodox narrative was supposed to be a undressing room, here becomes the gas chamber, while the house, which was supposed to be the gas chamber, here is a mere “forestry house.”

Süss does not say in which month these “experiments” were carried out, but gives the following indication:

“Meanwhile, new transports were arriving daily – thousands, even tens of thousands, and barracks were being built at a furious pace to accommodate the arrivals.”

This points to August 1942, when transports of deportees intensified: in June 21,496 deportees arrived at Auschwitz, in July 19,465, and in August 41,960.¹⁹⁴ But not even at that point was any mass extermination taking place according to Süss, precisely because new barracks for the deportees had to be built in a hurry in order to accommodate them. Another indirect confirmation of this month is provided by the statement that, during the “typhus epidemic,” which escalated in July 1942, “[w]hoever had a warm belly, was loaded onto a car in the evening as a typhus suspect and radically killed.” At this point, the interviewer, who evidently was familiar with the orthodox version of events, tried to suggest to Süss that this radical killing was committed with gas: “That is, at that time the gas was already...,” but was surprised by Süss’s rebutting reply: “No, only on a trial basis. There was no gas yet, only on an experimental basis in this barracks.” The interrogator then ventured to suggest that these prisoners were being shot, but then Süss puzzled him even more: “The people died a so-called natural death, that is, they were beaten to death, and most of them starved to death. Less calories, plus work. The result is always death.”

Now, according to Danuta Czech, the “selection” of typhus patients and their subsequent killing (with “phenol injections”) began on 3 July 1942, but presumably became a widespread practice the following month,¹⁹⁵ which leads back precisely to August 1942. Toward the end of the interview, Süss was evidently overcome by literary reminiscences, for he made a statement in total contradiction to this: “from 1941 to May 1942, the men and women had to strip naked and thus go to the gas chamber” (p. 35). But according to him, in August 1942 (let alone 1941), the alleged mass gassings had not yet begun.

On the fate of the Sonderkommando I have already dwelt in Chapter 8.

The following account is not based on (alleged) direct witness observations, but on information from the Sonderkommando’s scribe. Süss lists some stereotypical black propaganda, puerile lies, silly fables and various absurdities: the visit to the crematorium (which one?) first by Himmler and then by Eichmann (accompanied by SS Obersturmführer Johann Schwarzhuber, who, however, was not camp commandant, but leader of the protective-custody camp in men's camp at Birkenau), the 30 kg of gold extracted weekly from the corpses (Nyiszli had said 30-35 kg per day; Mattogno 2020b, p. 52), which was melted down into "balls" (Süss's strange invention), the capacity of the crematoria of up to "24,000 dead in 24 hours," the idiocy that it was enough to douse the corpses in the pits with gasoline and "later everything burned automatically."

Not content with that, Süss also invents Dr. Mengele's alleged "selection" "in the so-called infirmary," which cost the lives of some 3,000 inmates (the witness explains that "it was one of the largest numbers gassed at that time") and which took place "in the spring of 1943," evidently after 30 May, the day Mengele arrived at Auschwitz (Czech 1990, p. 408). But in June 1943 the Auschwitz Chronicle does not record any "selection," and neither in March, April, May, nor in July.

11. Maurice Schellekes

This witness wrote an untitled 4-page report that at the end is dated with “Haifa, Israel, December 1981” and bears Schellekes’ handwritten signature.

Eric Friedler, Barbara Siebert and Andreas Kilian present an excerpt of it in German translation (Friedler et al., pp. 78f.). Here I quote the essential part of the original report (the ellipses without brackets are in the original):¹⁹⁶

“Two days later, on the 10th of August I was put into a train and on the 11th of August 1942 the train arrived in Auschwitz-Birkenau. The arrival in Auschwitz has been described in so many papers and books that I don’t have to repeat it here. We were selected, our transport were 1200 people, men and women, of whom about 165 were selected to live for the time being. We were marched to a wooden barrack in Birkenau. An interpreter was called and he told us in Flemish (which is very similar to Dutch) where we were and what terrible future was in store for us. A doctor committed suicide on the spot by taking poison.

Our hair was shaven off and we were tattooed with a number in the left arm. During the first night when we ‘learned’ to go out of the ‘block’ (in this case a stone building with pig-sties) and line up and were beaten in again and out-and in-, about 15 of us were beaten to death. ...

The next morning the SS guards made us run for a few kilometers. They were beating us all the time and dogs were set at us, maiming terribly some prisoners. When we came to an open space near the woods, there was a strange, frightening, sweet-bitter smell in the air and when the SS clubbed us up a kind of a low hill, then I only saw that this was the earth, dug out of a mass grave full of rows of bodies of women covered with quick-lime. It was a sight so ghostly terrible that words on paper can simply not describe it.

And there was the ‘work’ which was awaiting me ... For the next month I worked in the so-called ‘open Sonderkommando’. Our task was to bury thousands of gassed men, women and children in mass graves. The crematoria were not ready yet and the people were gassed in a white farmhouse in the woods. From afar we could see them, standing naked and going in. Then flat lorries on a kind of railroad tracks brought the bodies to us and in the meantime we had dug swimming-pool size graves. We had to carry them in. All this under a burning sun with no water at all, not to drink and not to wash (!) and with the SS guards and Kapos beating us all the time to force us to ‘work’ faster. ...

It is not possible to describe here my feelings and impressions. ...

¹⁹⁶ GFHA, Catalog No. 451/12067.

When the grave was completely full the corpses were covered with quick-lime and we had to cover that with earth. This about four-week period was the most terrible time of my life.

On a Sunday-morning, about half of September a call went through the camp: 'all Dutchmen report'. A friend and I managed very dangerously to get by the SS man with a kind of machinegun and a dog. On both sides of the courtyard was such a guard because the Sonderkommando was not allowed to leave that courtyard. We had to undress and I went through my first real selection. When I came through we were marched to Auschwitz 'Hauptlager' (main camp). I was first for about a week in a quarantine barrack, I think the number was 14 or 14A, where again dozens got sick, mostly with terrible diarrhea and were brought away to be gassed.

I was taken to one of the stone blocks, number 4 and 4A, where I stayed for about five months. I worked in the 'Kartoffelkommando' (potato commando), earthmoving. 'Kieskommando' (gravel commando)."

One day, Schellekes was assigned to the "Kanada-Kommando," which had between 80 and 130 inmates housed in their own block, No. 4A at Auschwitz. "At times," he also worked in unspecified "Aussenkommandos" (external units, working outside the camp).

The witness continues:

"In February or March 1943 we were moved to Birkenau, in Block nr. 16, the section I do not remember. Then, after a few months to Block 24 in the men's B camp.

In 1944, in September I was brought to Brzezinka, a camp near the 'Sauna' and crematorium. I witnessed from very near the uprising in the crematorium by Sonderkommando on the 7th of October.

On the 18th of January 1945, when the Russian army approached I was 'evacuated' that means taken on the so called 'Death-march'."

He then arrived at Mauthausen, where he was registered under Number 119327. Schellekes' statement closes with these words:

"I of course saw the crematoria and I saw the cans of gas Cyclon B. I personally carried hundreds of bodies of Jewish men, women and children and I personally saw tens of thousands more. I went through several selections. In each of them a big part of us were doomed to go to the gas chambers. I had many times to bid farewell to good friends who went into the gas chambers a few hours later. A dear friend of mine parted in my presence from his son. The father went right after that into a gas chamber. Human words fail to describe what I went through at such moments. I eyewitnessed, what was even in Auschwitz (!) considered as the crime of crimes: SS men with tip lorries (dump trucks) dumping their load, Jewish old men, women and children (then they were surer of less resistance) alive into a burning ditch. Again, any sensible human expression fails me.

Were it not so immensely sad I would it rather ridiculous that we should today defend ourselves against the 'Auschwitz-lie' ('Die Auschwitz-Luege').

How dare they!."

On 11 August 1942, a transport of Jews from Lager Westerbork, Netherlands, actually arrived at Auschwitz, but it contained not 1,200, but only 559 deportees (Czech 1990, p. 214). Schellekes was taken to Birkenau and "the next morning," August 12, he was assigned to the "open Sonderkommando," a term not mentioned by any other witness or historian. According to Friedler et al., the inmates employed at the "bunkers" were divided into two units: "Sonderkommando 1 worked at Bunker 1, Sonderkommando 2 at Bunker 2" (Friedler et al., p. 81). Schellekes knew nothing of this, just as he did not know the term "bunker" and was even unaware that two bunkers are said to have existed at the time. In fact, he mentions only "a white farmhouse in the woods," which should be "Bunker 2," allegedly also called "White House," but for Schellekes this may not have been a technical term, since he did not know (or at least didn't mention) the complementary "Red House" (the alleged "Bunker 1").

At this "farmhouse," the witness saw the victims "standing naked and going in": he evidently knew nothing of the three alleged "undressing huts" either that were supposed to be in the vicinity of "Bunker 2." On his work "for the next month," digging mass graves and filling them with corpses, he is very general, and in this regard does not provide any historically useful details: how many mass graves were there? Where were they located? What size were they? How many corpses did they contain? How were they arranged there? All questions that Schellekes was clearly unable to answer.

Instead, he recounts that "on a Sunday-morning, about half of September," on 13 September 1942,¹⁹⁷ "a call went through the camp: 'all Dutchmen report.'" Apparently, this also concerned the inmates of the "open Sonderkommando," but here, again, his testimony is evanescent, for he states that the "Sonderkommando was not allowed to leave that courtyard," without even indicating in which block they were housed. The "selection" of Dutch detainees as such is nonsensical even from Danuta Czech's perspective (who in fact is evidently ignorant of it). In particular with reference to the Sonderkommando inmates, it is in stark contrast to the orthodox narrative: in this case, an allegedly dangerous "carrier of secrets" is said to have been "selected" not for killing, but for salvation! Then he was allegedly sent on a round tour of various lodgings at the Auschwitz and Birkenau Camps, so that he could spread the "secret" of the "white farmhouse" and mass graves to all the inmates! Initially, he was in fact sent "to Auschwitz 'Hauptlager'" (meaning the Main Camp), where he was in contact "for about five months" with the other inmates in the labor units mentioned by him.

¹⁹⁷ In this month, Sundays fell on the 6th, 13th, 20th, and 27th.

“In February or March 1943” Schellekes was transferred “to Birkenau,” but then, “in 1944, in September I was brought to Brzezinka, a camp near the ‘Sauna’ and crematorium.” Surprisingly, the witness believed that Birkenau and Brzezinka were two different camps, although Brzezinka is merely the Polish name of the village in whose area the Birkenau Camp was established. In this context, he mentions the term “crematorium” in the singular, and immediately thereafter reiterates:

“I witnessed from very near the uprising in the crematorium by Sonderkommando on the 7th of October.”

Unfortunately, he did not impart his valuable “eyewitness” testimony about this event to the historians. Later he uses the term in the plural, in another invaluable testimony:

“I of course saw the crematoria and I saw the cans of gas Cyclon B. I personally carried hundreds of bodies of Jewish men, women and children and I personally saw tens of thousands more. I went through several selections. In each of them a big part of us were doomed to go to the gas chambers.”

In practice, he “saw” everything, but told nothing specific.

The culmination of his “eyewitness” testimony is the grim fable of black propaganda, set also in Auschwitz Main Camp (the “Hauptlager”), perhaps driven by a desire to be original:

“I eyewitnessed, what was even in Auschwitz (!) considered as the crime of crimes: SS men with tip lorries (dump trucks) dumping their load, Jewish old men, women and children (then they were surer of less resistance) alive into a burning ditch.”

The final mention of the “Auschwitz-lie” (“Die Auschwitz-Lüge”), which is the well-known title of a 1974 brochure by German war veteran Thies Christophersen, helps to explain the motivation for this late testimony: Angered by revisionist criticism, Schellekes felt compelled to “refute” it by inventing a clumsy fable, based on descriptions “in so many papers and books” and vouchsafed by his “moral authority” as a former deportee – but with this testimony he only confirmed and corroborated the revisionist criticism.

12. David Karvat

In January 1947, Michele Tagliacozzo collected in Metaponto (in the Italian Province Basilicata) the testimony in Yiddish of a self-proclaimed member of the Auschwitz Sonderkommando, David Karvat, and translated it into Italian.¹⁹⁸ This testimony is virtually unknown to Holocaust historiography. In the text, which I quote below, the initials “M.T.” refer to explanations by Michele Tagliacozzo.

“– I worked for about a year in the Sonderkommando at Birkenau (Auschwitz II) removing corpses from the gas chambers and transporting them to the crematoria.

– After said period, I went on to work in the ‘Kanada’ squads (Aufräumungskommando [sic]. M.T.), and with the approach of the Russians, we were transported to other different camps, in Germany, until liberation in May 1945. I was liberated by the Russians, and immediately after that I went to the American Zone.

– Around the middle of October (1943. M.T.) news had spread that five thousand rich Italian Jews would arrive.

– I remember the date well because the arrival of Italians and then [=and moreover] rich ones, by all accounts, constituted for us, and also for the Germans, a complete novelty and a curiosity.

– One morning, we were ready for the arrival of the Italians (Jews. M.T.) then these did not arrive, and instead small groups of ‘muslims’ (sick and weak destined for extermination. M.T.) selected from the various labor camps in Auschwitz were brought to the chambers.

– The next day, immediately after roll call, we learned that during the night the Italians had arrived from Rome, so we imagined that work would be intense that morning.

– After about an hour, trucks arrived from the sorting camp that was in Auschwitz No. 1, but not as many as they expected. Perhaps 500 or 600 people but no more, while according to calculations they expected two thousand destined for elimination among the five thousand who arrived. Surprise that among the arrivals are many young men and women who should have remained among those selected to work. Another surprise that they are not as rich as we were told. The rich Dutch and French were better-dressed. (Here he alludes to the eliminations of [Jews from] those countries. M.T.) But the Italians dressed in light clothes far from suitable for the climate here.

¹⁹⁸ “Testimonianza orale in yiddish amezzo traduttore, dell’ex deportato David Karvat. Metaponto, gennaio 1947.” GFHA, Catalog No. 29345.

- It is difficult to make ourselves understood because of the language, and these Italians speak only Italian. The SS try to explain the usual story about the showers. No one understands, and some confusion happens. Then a well-dressed older man shows a row of medals and shouts something in German that I do not understand. At this point, the group begins to break up. Some children try to join other people, and many succeed by sticking tightly to them. Then suddenly some woman screams. At this point, one of the SS steps forward and hits the woman with a stick, and snatches the baby she was carrying from her. The child is pushed into the entrance of the building. Here, other SS do the same thing with other women. Then they all begin to enter, and the work is made more difficult. Only then do I notice that a little girl is lying on the ground in front of the entrance with a wounded head.
- The one I mentioned was the first group. The second group waited not far away, but could neither see nor hear what was happening, since a wall and some buildings separated them from us. And then the usual hubbub that filled the camp every morning covered any other noise.
- After everyone had entered, things proceeded as in any other elimination. Eventually, we began extracting the bodies from the chambers.
- In contrast, the second group entered calmly and unaware of the fate [that awaited them]. This time, a prisoner who knew Italian explained everything well, according to SS orders, and so everyone entered calmly.
- The SS then explained to us that the young men were immediately eliminated because they were immediately qualified as lazy in character and therefore unfit for work. In contrast, another SS told me a few days later that they had been immediately eliminated because they were Badoglio Jews who had helped the king, who was also of Jewish descent (!) to overthrow Mussolini.
- I did not hear anything about the group selected for work. They were in another section of Auschwitz.
- After this transport of Italians, I had no further occasion to see any more, also because, fortunately, I was not eliminated like my other workmates, but was transferred to another job. This I owed mostly to the protection of a Kapo, a German inmate, 'green triangle' (criminal. M.T.), on whose compassion I could count."

Karvat is completely unknown to Friedler et al., who provide the most exhaustive list of Sonderkommando inmates (Friedler et al., pp. 371-391). All that is known of this Karvat is that he was a Czechoslovak Jew. His testimony as a Sonderkommando member is entirely evanescent. It is clear that he knew nothing about either the "gas chambers," the crematoria, or cremation; he does not even mention the crematorium number where he claims to have worked – indeed, not even the term crematorium – and he does not say how many existed. It is equally clear that he was unfamiliar with the pertinent black propaganda either, because if we follow his testimony, the victims entered the crematorium through the “entrance of the building,” which would refer to Crematoria IV-V, but the remaining victims did not wait in the respective yards, but in a – non-existent – place separated by “a wall and some buildings.”

Karvat’s stay in the Sonderkommando is also chronologically uncertain: he claims to have worked there “for about a year,” but the only verifiable chronological reference is October 1943; then, at an indeterminate date, he claims to have been transferred to “Kanada” (the Inmate Property Warehouse) thanks to the “protection of a Kapo,” but this is in stark contrast to the tall tale of the alleged elimination of the “carriers of secrets.” We may infer from the sentence “I was not eliminated like my other workmates” that Karvat considered himself the only Sonderkommando survivor.

His testimony focuses on the first Jewish transport of Italian Jews to Auschwitz, which left Rome on 18 October 1943, and arrived at the camp on the 23rd. It consisted of at least 1,023 identified persons, among whom 149 men and 47 women were registered.¹⁹⁹ 827 deportees were allegedly gassed, which Karvat numbers at 500-600. For some inscrutable reason, these were brought into the “building” in two groups, allegedly 250-300 people each, which were gassed separately, one group after the other. However, according to the official story, the crematoria at Birkenau (as pointed out earlier) included a wide range of “gas chambers” presumably permitting the concurrent killing of variously sized groups of deportees, from a few hundred to 3,000, so this split gassing makes little sense.

The gassing of “many young men and women” fit for work is incomprehensible from the orthodox perspective. The two motives given by the witness, on the other hand, is ridiculous: these young men and women were either “lazy” or “Badoglians,” who had helped the king, who allegedly was of Jewish descent!

The fact that the testimony is almost exclusively about the first Jewish transport from Italy could depend on an explicit request by Michele Tagliacozzo, but this would be no-less-astonishing, because this would mean that Tagliacozzo, a Holocaust historian, would have been content with this insultingly superficial account, without asking his “eyewitness” for further, valuable information about the “extermination machinery” at Auschwitz.

13. Moritz Rosenblum

I close this study with the testimony of a certain Moritz Rosenblum, which was summarized by Gideon Greif and Itamar Levin in a German book whose title translates to Revolt in Auschwitz: The Revolt of the Jewish "Sonderkommando" on October 7, 1944 (Greif/Levin, pp. 39f.). Rosenblum was not a member of the Sonderkommando, but his account is important both because of the date (26 May 1945), because he claimed to have been an eyewitness to a gassing, and finally because he presents a different version of the legendary narrative concerning the gas chambers. Rosenblum, who was 22 years old, was arrested in Łódź on 16 December 1940, then sent to a forced-labor camp near Frankfurt upon Oder, from where he was transferred to Auschwitz in December 1942. He did not indicate either the day of his arrival or the registration number assigned to him. Here is his account:²⁰⁰

"When I arrived at Auschwitz the transport, consisting of several hundred people, was divided into two groups. One group consisted of all the old people and the other the young and healthy people. Those young people not 100% fit were included with the old people. This latter group were told they were going to a camp where there was no work to do. These people were then taken to the bath-house and ordered to undress. Then the doors were locked and S.S. men placed the contents of five or six large tins containing gas powder through a locker into the chamber. I know this is true because I saw it. I myself was chosen for the gas chamber as I was suffering from a bad leg. On arrival at the bath-house another selection was made and all the skilled men were taken out. I do not know the names of any persons in charge of the selection. As I was a welder I was one of those taken out. In company with a few others I was taken out into a square outside the bath-house. Before this we had been stripped of all our clothing and had to wait for our numbers to be tattooed on our left arms. Whilst waiting I saw the first group of people who had entered the bath-house about twenty minutes before, being removed from the rear exit of this bath-house dead. These bodies were placed on carts and removed. Whilst I was waiting I saw a car arrive containing two or three officers of the S.S. These officers wore rubber gloves and I saw them empty the contents of five or six tins into an opening leading into the bath-house. As soon as this opening was closed from the outside I heard loud screams from the bath-house. A few minutes later there was silence and a group of S.S. men with an S.S. Doctor put on respirators and went into the bath-house. I do not know the names of the S.S. men or Doctor but I know he was a Doctor because I heard him addressed as 'STANDARTENARZT'. After about five or ten minutes the S.S. people came out of the bath-house. The prisoners who were at the rear exit had to remove the bodies. It was strictly prohibited to speak to this working party and they were billeted separately. They were called 'SONDERKOMMANDO'. This means 'special task'. These men received food and were allowed liquor. I believe this was for purpose of keeping them in a state of intoxication. They worked in two shifts and I know that these men were put into the gas chamber themselves after a certain time. I was told this by a brother of one of the men who was selected for this work. I do not know his name.

[Handwritten note] The commandant at the time I arrived at Auschwitz and who was present at the selection, was SCHWARZ, Obersturmführer, SCHETEL also took part."

The only Jewish transport that came to Auschwitz from Germany in December 1942 was the 24th Transport of the Reich Security Main Office, which contained 1,060 people, of whom 162 were registered and 898 are said to have been gassed, if we follow Danuta Czech (Czech 1990, p. 283). According to the relevant list, "With the 24th Transport to the East, 997 Berliners were deported, 3 more persons came from Neuendorf and Radinkendorf,"²⁰¹ so these deportees did not come from a forced-labor camp near Frankfurt upon Oder.

Rosenblum's phantom transport consisted of "several hundred people," who were subjected to a selection upon arrival: in one group were gathered "all the old people and the other the young and healthy people," in the other "the young and healthy people"; a third category, the "young people not 100% fit," was assigned to the first group. This was then taken "to the bath-house," where a second selection took place, which contradicts the orthodox narrative, which knows of only one selection on arrival, during which deportees fit for work were picked out and admitted to the camp. During this second selection "all the skilled men were taken out," including the witness, an inexplicable fact, in that he was destined for gassing because he "was suffering from a bad leg." Here, the "gas chamber" – in the singular – enters the scene, which was located in a "bath-house." This "gas chamber" had at least two doors, one entrance and one exit at the back, and the "gas powder," was poured there "through a locker" or "into an opening," in the amount of "five or six tins."

After the second selection, Rosenblum "was taken out into a square outside the bath-house" and, while waiting for his registration number to be tattooed, he "saw" being taken away "from the rear exit of this bath-house" the corpses of the first group of deportees who had entered it about twenty minutes earlier. Since the total number of deportees was "several hundred people" and they had undergone two selections, it is clear that the number of those allegedly gassed was even smaller; nevertheless, they had to be gassed in at least two groups. The corpses "were placed on carts and removed," it is unknown where to. As he waited his turn for the tattooing, the witness could comfortably observe the alleged gassing. He “saw” the arrival of a car “containing two or three officers of the S.S.,” but did not know that this vehicle was supposed to bear the insignia of the Red Cross. In an excess of zeal, he attributes to them the use of “rubber gloves” and “respirators,” a detail not reported by any other Sonderkommando witnesses.

The “Doctor” was not any Standartenarzt, but possibly the Standortarzt (garrison physician), and Heinrich Schwarz was not Obersturmführer, but Hauptsturmführer, and in December 1942 he held the position of Head of Department IIIa (Labor Deployment), not commandant. No Obersturmführer Schetel is known. The information Rosenblum allegedly received “by a brother of one of the men” in the Sonderkommando is extremely vague, although he claimed to have remained in Auschwitz until January 1945: in two years he should have learned more!

The fundamental problem is that in December 1942 only the “bunkers” at Birkenau were purportedly in operation as gassing installations, but it is self-evident that the “bath-house” mentioned by Rosenblum could not have been either of them, because in the vicinity of it there was “a square outside the bath-house” where the inmates received their tattoos, a setting incompatible with the two “bunkers.” Instead, the witness’s description, regardless of his extermination fantasies, matches Birkenau’s Construction Sector BIb, which, as I explained earlier, included a “delousing facility” with “wash and shower room” (the “bath-house”) and an “admission block” where inmates were tattooed with their registration numbers.

Conclusions

The concepts of “accumulation of memories” (what David Irving called “cross pollination”) and even-more-so of “collective memory,” both introduced by Stefania Zazza when trying to explain David Lea’s disconnected ramblings, are undoubtedly fundamental hermeneutical criteria, but one cannot start with the assumption that all “memories” are a priori “undoubtedly true,” as Zazza did. David Lea was in fact “undoubtedly” an impostor, a mythomaniac, a braggart, and he was intellectually inept, because he failed to even give a semblance of logic and coherence to the stories he drew from the “collective memory.”

When it comes to the alleged extermination of the Jews, I call this “collective memory” instead Holocaustic fairy-tale fiction that developed from the black propaganda created by the various Auschwitz resistance groups – a fiction that contains several variations of individual themes, which are sometimes even conflicting, precisely because they are not based on reality.

With regard to Josef Sackar, Jaacov Gabai, Eliezer Eisenschmidt, Shaul Chasan, Leon Cohen and Daniel Bennahmias (Shlomo Venezia deserves a separate examination), the concept of “accumulation of memories” would make sense only if assuming that they testified in good faith and had told the truth as they had seen it, but the absurdities and lies with which their statements are riddled lead one to decisively exclude this possibility. David Karvat was instead a mere braggart, who appropriated poorly understood excerpts of this fable. This was also true of Moritz Rosenblum, who, like Karvat, focused his testimony about his two-year presence in the camp only on the alleged events of the arrival.

As for Szlama Dragon, the intentionally and, one might add, demonstrably untruthful character of his testimony is evident as early as his first interrogation by the Soviet Commission of Inquiry on 26 February 1945, and is confirmed by his interrogation by Judge Jan Sehn on 10-11 May 1945 (see my analysis in Mattoigno 2022b, Chapter 4, pp. 115-143). Since the Soviet interrogation was completely unknown to Gideon Greif, he, among other things, could not ask Dragon to account for why, as of February 1945, he did not then know the official terms “Bunkers” 1 and 2, but always used the expression “Gas Chamber” (газовая камера, gazovaya kamera) Nos. 1 and 2. The witness, of course, was careful not to volunteer any explanation for this.

Abraham Dragon was clearly steeped in the novelization told by his brother, and did not miss the opportunity to carve out his own commemorative space by also posing as a Sonderkommando “survivor.”

Franz Süss is the only witness who gives a fairly truthful account of the purposes of the mass graves at Birkenau, which he then tried to twist in a criminal direction by resorting to the meager propaganda information he knew. In contrast to this stands Maurice Schellekes’s testimony, who, on the basis of even scarcer knowledge, invented his fables with the explicit aim of countering revisionist historiography.

In 1998, Valentina Pisanty, a researcher in the field of interpreting the meaning of the children’s fairy tale “Little Red Riding Hood”(!), had made a witless foray into Holocaust historiography in a work on so-called “denialism,” where she revealed the following masterful analysis of Holocaust testimonies (Pisanty, p. 183):

“Writers often interweave their direct observations with fragments of ‘hearsay’ whose circulation was widespread in the camp. Most of the inaccuracies found in these texts can be attributed to the witnesses’ confusion between what they saw with their own eyes and what they heard during their internment period. As the years go by, then, the memory of the events experienced is compounded by the reading of other works on the subject, with the result that autobiographies written in more recent times lose the immediacy of recollection in favor of a more coherent and complete view of the extermination process.”

This clear explanation of the concepts of “accumulation of memories” and “collective memory” is perfectly applicable to all the penultimate and final-hour witnesses analyzed in this study, but particularly to Shlomo Venezia, by far the most-important witness due to the attention granted him by the media (and undeservedly so). Indeed, his book Sonderkommando Auschwitz is presented as “The Truth about the Gas Chambers” and as “A unique testimony.” These judgments are completely unfounded even from the point of view of orthodox Holocaust historiography, since his book does not provide any previously unknown “truths,” and only repeats in a confused way the “truths” already known. It makes no important nor even merely trivial new contribution to knowledge about Auschwitz; on the contrary, it systematically sidesteps all historically relevant issues. It doesn’t even contain any perceptible chronology of events. After the date of his arrival at Auschwitz (11 April 1944; Venezia 2007a, p. 42), the next date that appears in the book is early October 1944

(ibid., p. 140), so that the account of nearly five months of activity in the Sonderkommando at Crematorium III takes place in a kind of time outside of time.

On this Sonderkommando, Venezia does not give any historically useful information: how many inmates it consisted of, how they were distributed among the various crematoria, what their specific tasks were, etc. Even on the final uprising of the Sonderkommando, he fails to give any relevant details, including the date.

Venezia speaks of Crematorium III in an extremely vague way: he says nothing about what it looked like externally, almost nothing about what it looked like internally, nothing about what the attic looked like, where his quarters were located.

The extermination process also remains similarly shrouded in fog in Venezia's book.

It contains no description of "Bunker 2," nor of its alleged "cremation pits," whose number Venezia does not even indicate.

As for Crematorium III, the description of the undressing room is evanescent, that of the gas chamber nonexistent. Historical issues essential to refute "denialism," such as that of the devices for the introduction of Zyklon B, vanish into an embarrassing silence; from the book, we learn neither what the size of the gas chamber was, nor how it was structured,²⁰² nor how it was equipped, nor how the vents of the ventilation and deaeration system were arranged, nor how it was accessed from the undressing room. No mention of what the concrete roof of Morgue #1 in the north courtyard of the crematorium looked like, whether it was at ground level or elevated, whether it had "chimneys," and if so, how many there were and how they were arranged.

The same fog hovers over the cremation narrative: again, everything is elusive and indistinct. Venezia says nothing about the crematoria: about their design, their operation, their coke consumption, not even their number. On their cremation capacity, on the other hand, the book provides three precise but technically absurd and mutually contradictory figures.

From the point of view of orthodox Holocaust historiography, therefore, this testimony can only be called "unique" because of its insubstantiality, its intangibility, its evanescence, and its total extraordinary lack of concreteness and accuracy.

The historians who assisted in this publishing project²⁰³ demonstrate all the limitations of atavistic ineptitude. Their most noticeable contribution, in the text, is limited to a simple revision of terminology²⁰⁴ and the introduction of technical terms²⁰⁵ previously absent, but not without a few blunders, such as in the use of the terms “Leichenkeller” or “Stücke.” The apparatus of the explanatory notes (Venezia 2007a, pp. 221-223) is paltry and uncritical. But it is not just a matter of ineptitude. In the essay “La Shoah, Auschwitz e il Sonderkommando” (ibid., pp. 181-205), Auschwitz “specialist” Marcello Pezzetti mentions Gideon Greif’s book Wir weinten tränenlos... (Greif 1995) in his bibliography. The idea of the iconography of Sonderkommando Auschwitz is clearly taken from Greif’s work. In fact, it contains almost all the images that appear in it.²⁰⁶ Despite this, Pezzetti did not inform the reader of the very-important fact that Greif’s work collects the testimonies of as many as four alleged Sonderkommando companions of Venezia, including his cousin Jaacov Gabai. This serious “oversight” becomes most-serious in view of the incredible contradictions that these testimonies present with respect to Venezia’s account. Therefore, one suspects rather an intentional and judicious omission.

No-less-serious is the fact that Pezzetti and his colleagues have been silent about all the contradictions of Venezia’s narrative with respect to the dogmas of orthodox Holocaust historiography, and all the chronological and architectural inconsistencies, as laid out in this study.

From the revisionist perspective, the judgment on Venezia’s book is even harsher. His book very evidently leaves the impression of a “reading of other works on the subject,” especially that of David Olère’s fundamental album, but also of the testimonies of Miklos Nyiszli and Filip Müller. To this, we must add Venezia’s meetings with other self-proclaimed former Sonderkommando members and historians.²⁰⁷ The photograph that appeared in 2002 in Il Giornale, later reprinted in *Gente*²⁰⁸ is revealing: it shows Venezia holding David Olère’s album opened in his hands, on the very page where the drawing is clearly visible that was later reproduced on p. 92 of Sonderkommando Auschwitz. Venezia mentions Olère several times there, and even claims to have met him:

²⁰⁵ By this I mean terms related to camp’s facilities or operations.

²⁰⁶ A map of Birkenau (Greif 1995, pp. XLIV-XLV) similar to that published in Venezia’s book (2007a, pp. 56f.), a photo of Crematorium III, (Greif 1995, p. L; Venezia 2007a, p. 73) and of outdoor cremation (Greif 2015, pp. XLVIII; Venezia 2007a, p. 80), and moreover seven drawings by Olère that appear in the Venezia’s book on pp. 76, 82, 84, 86, 88, 90, 92, reproduced respectively on pp. 66, 240, 13, 17, 90, 274, 143 in Greif 1995.

²⁰⁸ Another photo also appears in this magazine showing Venezia with the same album, opened on the page with a drawing of a crematorium chimney spewing flames. Venezia/Lorenzetto 2002a, p. 79.

"I did not see any Frenchmen; otherwise I would have tried to talk to them. David Olère, for example, I did not know that he had been deported from France; to me he was a Pole who spoke Yiddish."

Venezia's narrative concerning the alleged extermination process is in fact essentially a commentary on Olère's often-misinterpreted drawings. The choice to publish many of Olère's drawings in this volume, undoubtedly prompted by its editors, is only apparently shrewd, as it seems to provide confirmation of the veracity of Venezia's narrative. In reality, however, such an assumption turns out to be misguided, for it is all-too-evident that Venezia's narrative is based on Olère's drawings. Proof of this is the fact that they show grossly false scenarios that Venezia is unable or unwilling to correct.

In his drawings, David Olère, far from representing reality, simply illustrated the propaganda themes created by the Auschwitz resistance movement that circulated in the camp.

Venezia emphatically proclaimed his status as an "eyewitness" (Venezia 2007a, pp. 75-77):

"Birkenau was a real hell, no one can understand or enter into the logic of the camp. That is why I want to tell all I can, trusting only my memories, what I am sure I saw and nothing more."

But he could not have seen unreal scenarios, such as fictitious palisades, illusory Jewish transports, flame-spewing chimneys, recovery of imaginary human fat, nonexistent premises, fantasy gassings, impossible cremations, etc., nor experienced such implausible stories as that of his own "salvation."

In conclusion, echoing Pisanty's analysis, we could say that Shlomo Venezia's testimony is the result of confusion between what the witness saw with his own eyes (practically nothing), what he heard during his internment, and what was added later to his real recollection of events from reading other works on the subject, with the result that the immediacy of recollection disappeared and was replaced by a more-coherent and -comprehensive view of the alleged extermination process, which basically means that it was turned into a historical novel. But this mental process could not have taken place automatically, without a specific, directed will of the witness.

The final balance, which results from the critical analysis of all known Sonderkommando witnesses statements, can be summarized in one simple sentence. They roughly fall into three main categories, with inevitable overlaps: intentional liars, braggarts and morons.

Introduction

“Habent sua fata libelli” – Books have their own destiny. This adage applies not least to the present book.

It all began in October 1993, on the fourth of that month, when the German news magazine Der Spiegel published an article with the lurid title “The Engineers of Death” (“Die Ingenieure des Todes”). Based on the British-Jewish researcher Gerald Fleming, who had conducted research in Moscow archives, the Hamburg news magazine published excerpts from the interrogation records of three engineers from the Erfurt engineering company Topf and Sons, who had been arrested by the Soviet occupying forces in March 1946. They were Kurt Prüfer, chief engineer for cremation furnaces and heating systems, Karl Schultze, chief engineer for ventilation systems, and Gustav Braun, production manager at Topf. (In addition to Prüfer, Schultze and Braun, the Soviets also caught a fourth engineer, Fritz Sander, chief engineer at Topf & Sons).

All four defendants were accused of participating in an outrageous mass murder. A huge number of people, it was said, had been murdered in gas chambers at Auschwitz, and the bodies of those killed had been burned in cremation furnaces. Through their involvement in the construction and installation of the cremation furnaces and in setting up the ventilation equipment, the Topf engineers were accused of having actively aided and abetted this mass murder.

However, the prosecutors were unable to provide any documentary or material evidence for the claimed gas-chamber genocide. In reality, the crematoria at Auschwitz Main Camp and Auschwitz Birkenau had been built for hygienic reasons. The death rates in those camps had been terrifyingly high, mainly due to recurrent epidemics of typhus in the camp, and the capacity of the Main Camp’s crematorium (Krema I) proved to be insufficient. Initially, the corpses that could not be cremated were simply buried, but because this was associated with considerable danger due to the high groundwater level near Auschwitz, it was decided to build four more crematoria in the Auschwitz Birkenau Camp. The Topf Company was commissioned to provide the furnaces for these facilities.

The engineers in question had not extinguished a single human life through their work. Quite to the contrary, they had certainly saved thousands of people, because without these crematoria, the death toll at Auschwitz and Birkenau undoubtedly would have been even higher. Under normal circumstances, no one would have thought of accusing these men of a crime, but in 1946, the circumstances were not normal. The nascent “Holocaust” story was in urgent need of cementing, and in the absence of documentary or forensic evidence, this could only be achieved through witness statements and perpetrator confessions.

According to Der Spiegel, the spontaneity and accuracy of these confessions is beyond the shadow of a doubt:

“It is unlikely that the confessions were made under pressure. Already having been incriminated by written documents, they may have hoped to influence the verdict with their frank confessions.”

The leading German disinformation media outlet did not deign to tell its readers what “written documents” had been used to “incriminate” the engineers.

While Fritz Sander died of heart failure just three weeks after his arrest, his three colleagues were each sentenced to 25 years of forced labor in 1948. Kurt Prüfer did not survive the Gulag, but Braun and Schultze were released in 1956 thanks to an amnesty. We have no information about their further fate.

Since the interrogation transcripts are of extraordinary historical interest, Carlo Mattogno and I made an effort to locate these documents at the end of 1995, when we were conducting research in Moscow archives. According to Der Spiegel, Fleming had found them in the “Central State Archives,” but an archive of this name does not exist in Moscow. There is a “State Archive of the Russian Federation,” but Fleming had never been there, as results from the fact that the archive’s ledgers recording each visitor have no entry with Fleming’s name or signature. The archive’s management moreover assured us that the protocols we were looking for were not in their possession. Fleming had been to the storage center for historical-documentary collections (now the Russian State Military Archive), but no trace of the relevant documents could be found there either. As we suspected that the interrogation records might be kept in the archives of the Federal Security Service, we submitted a request for authorization during a subsequent visit to Moscow in spring 2001, which was granted a few months later. In February 2002, I was able to inspect and copy the documents. I will always remember vividly the two days I spent there; the incredibly friendly director gave me every conceivable help. In return for the admission and permission to copy the much sought-after documents, he asked for a vacuum cleaner, which we bought together for some $400. At that time, Russia was still suffering badly from the consequences of the disastrous 1990s, and there was a general shortage of all kinds of supplies and devices.

This vacuum cleaner turned out to have been a rather profitable investment, because the protocols actually proved to be incredibly significant. With unsurpassed clarity, they illustrate the fragility of a view of history based on “confessions.” From the outset, the engineers used Soviet terminology in their statements: they spoke of “Hitlerite Germany” and “Nazi Germany” as well as of the “war that Germany waged against the peoples of Europe” – a clear indication that their statements were either made under pressure or simply put into their mouths by their interrogators.

Just as the defendants at the Moscow show trials of 1937 and 1938 admitted to crimes that they could not possibly have committed (for example, meetings with imperialist agents in hotels that had been demolished long before the date of the alleged meetings), the Topf engineers also put things on record that could not be true under any circumstances. Fritz Sander, for example, testified on 7 March 1946 that his colleague Prüfer had told him in the summer of 1942, after a visit to Auschwitz, that a colossal number of Jews, including Greek Jews, had been murdered in that camp. In reality, the first Greek Jews were deported to Auschwitz only in March 1943. According to Sander, the bodies of those murdered were burned “in crematoria” (plural). The fact is, however, that only one crematorium existed in Auschwitz in the summer of 1942 – that of the Main Camp. Fleming replaced the year “1942” with “1943” to eliminate this anachronism. The wrong date also appears in the Spiegel article, which relies on Fleming. These forgers work with such shabby tricks.

Another striking feature of the interrogations is that the engineers’ memory improved continuously. On 5 March 1946, Prüfer had given the following testimony:

“I saw [in Auschwitz] a gas chamber from the outside; there was a wooden barracks, I saw a connection to the gas chamber, from this gas chamber, there was a connection to the crematorium.”

Even from the perspective of orthodox historiography, none of this makes any sense. The gas chambers were supposed to have been inside the crematoria – what possible connection could there be with “the crematorium”? And which one did he mean anyway?

Exactly two years later, on 4 March 1948, Prüfer’s memory had miraculously improved, and he provided a very precise description of Crematorium II at Birkenau, including the gassings that allegedly took place there. Prüfer had obviously received some private lessons in contemporary history from his jailers. In 1946, the Auschwitz picture was still very blurred, so that the Soviet officers did not really know what they actually wanted to hear from Prüfer. By early 1948, however, the orthodox Auschwitz picture had already taken on clear contours thanks to two trials held in Poland in 1947 – the Warsaw Trial of the first camp commandant Rudolf Höss, and the Krakow Trial of 40 former members of the camp staff. In early 1948, therefore, the interrogators could easily foist a version of events onto Prüfer, which he then regurgitated during this interrogation.

The fact that the advocates of the orthodox Holocaust narrative are still forced to this day to resort to such incredible confessions, obviously obtained under duress, in order to “prove” their monstrous fantasy of a gigantic massacre in chemical slaughterhouses, shows the full extent of their despair.

Jürgen Graf, December 2013.

Part One:
Historical and Technical Analysis of the Interrogations

1. Background: Gerald Fleming's Visit to a Moscow Archive

On 18 February 1990, Russian journalist Ella Maximova published an article in the Izvestia newspaper titled "Five Days in the Special Archive: Under Lock and Key." She revealed in it the existence in Moscow of a "special archive" containing the records of the Auschwitz Central Construction Office. Upon learning of the article, Gerald Fleming (1921-2006), then emeritus reader in German at the University of Surrey, United Kingdom, immediately contacted the Russian authorities to obtain permission to visit this archive. In 1982, the German edition of Flemings book Hitler and the Final Solution was released (Hitler und die Endlösung). This book was a response to the well-known thesis set forth five years earlier by British historian David Irving that Jewish extermination had been carried out on Himmler's orders and without Hitler's knowledge.

In mid-May 1990, Fleming received a phone call telling him the name and "the address of the archive in Moscow where the documents (some 9,000 papers in all) are lodged" (Fleming 1991, p. 10). What happened next was described by Fleming as follows (ibid., p. 11):

"On 30 October, I flew to Moscow, hoping that, in eight or nine working days, I would have analysed sufficient material to be in a position to add some significant new 'criminal traces' to those thirty-nine established from among already known German war-time documents by Jean Claude Pressac in his important work Auschwitz: Technique and Operation of the Gas Chambers, published by the Beate Klarsfeld Foundation in New York in 1989. On arrival at the Special Archive at Vyborskaya ulitsa 3, I was informed that all the papers of special interest to me would at once be driven to the Central State Archive at B. Pirogovskaya 17, where I could start the following morning after I had obtained the necessary pass. This also applied, interestingly enough, to the archives assistant assigned to me for the full working period.

I managed to deal with some 800-900 papers per day and examined about 85 percent of the total Zentralbauleitung holdings during my Moscow stay."

In another article that appeared a few months later, Fleming reported (1992, p. 18):

"Over a period of five weeks, I managed to deal with 800 papers a day and succeeded in locating a number of entirely unknown criminal indicators in the correspondence between the SS Central Building Administration Auschwitz and its immediate superiors in the SS construction hierarchy, the Amtsgruppenchef C, headed by SS Brigadeführer Dr Hans Kammler.”

But a few days earlier, in an article evidently based on an interview with Fleming, British journalist Brian Cathcart had written (1992, p. 17):

“Working in a special room at the government archive in Moscow, he tackled the mountain of 7,000 documents, reading hundreds every day and photocopying many.”

Fleming’s stay in Moscow for five weeks is (inexplicably) inaccurate, because then he would have viewed (taking into account the closure of the archives on Saturdays and Sundays) no less than 20,000 documents, but he claimed to have examined about 7,000, or roughly 85 percent of the 9,000 documents brought to him. I will return to this essential point later. The balance of his research can be summarized as follows (Fleming 1991, p. 12):

“Among the photocopied documents which I brought back to London, I found at least eighteen previously unknown ‘traces of criminality’ in war-time official correspondence relating to ‘Sonderaktionen’ and ‘Sonderbehandlung’ in the crematoria of Auschwitz-Birkenau – eighteen new indicators of mass crimes, over and above the thirty-five ‘criminal traces’ generally agreed to exist in documents previously known, relating to this terrible camp.”

In reality, these alleged “criminal traces” are completely insubstantial. Fleming considered them to be so only by virtue of his ignorance of the meaning and historical context of the documents, as I have demonstrated in two of my studies dealing with the issues involved (Mattogno 2016a&b).

For the present book, Fleming’s discovery of the Soviet interrogations of four engineers from the company J.A. Topf and Sons of Erfurt is of far greater value. These engineers devised and built the cremation furnaces set up at the various crematoria at Auschwitz and Birkenau: Gustav Braun, Kurt Prüfer, Fritz Sander and Karl Schultze.

Fleming announced his discovery on 18 July 1993 in an article titled “Engineers of Death.” In it, he quoted excerpts from the interrogations of Prüfer, Sander and Schultze, noting (Fleming 1993):

“In ‘Auschwitz: Technique and Operation of the Gas Chambers,’ published in 1989 by the Beate Klarsfeld Foundation in New York, Jean-Claude Pressac noted that the four disappeared from the records with their arrest. ‘For the historian,’ he wrote, ‘the trace ends there for the moment.’

In May 1993, I discovered documents detailing both the fate of these engineers and the full extent of their knowing, sober participation in the Holocaust. The facts are detailed in File 17/9 of the Red Army’s intelligence branch, never before made available to any historian. Since 1990, when I read an article in Izvestia noting that the Auschwitz Central Building records had been captured by Soviet troops and were still in Soviet archives, I have been studying these papers with the permission of the Russian authorities. My search for related material in the Russian Central State archive turned up File 17/9."

On 4 October 1993, the German news magazine Der Spiegel published a lengthy account of Fleming's findings under the title "Protocols of Death" ("Protocols..."). In the new English edition of his book on Hitler and the Final Solution, which appeared in 1994, Fleming published lengthy excerpts from some of the Topf engineers' interrogations, presenting them as follows (1994, p. 193):

"Then, in May 1993, in a Moscow Central State Archive depository, I discovered File 17/9, Topf and Söhne, Erfurt, which dealt with the wartime activities and fate of the senior Auschwitz-Birkenau crematorium engineers from that firm."

The puzzling fact should be noted, however, that Fleming never mentioned this discovery in any paper or book. He was the first Western researcher to be admitted to the Moscow archives, but he made no use of its results. He was soon followed by others, who were far more serious with their ambitions than Fleming, by giving an account of the documentary holdings they had viewed, or which otherwise existed.¹

In July 1995, Jürgen Graf, Russell Granata and I went to Moscow for the first of four visits to the archives in the Russian capital. The others took place in late 1995, 2000 and 2001.² The main purpose of our visits was to examine the archives of the Central Construction Office in Auschwitz, and less importantly to find documentation related to the work which the Soviet Commission of Inquiry carried out in Auschwitz in February and March 1945. But we were also very interested in the interrogations of Topf engineers found by Fleming.

The documentation of the Central Construction Office Auschwitz was stored in the archive on Viborgskaya Street, which was then called Tsentr Khranenya Istorico-documel'tl'nikh Colletsii (Documentation Center of the Historical-Documentary Collection), but until 1992, its name had been Tsentr'al'ny Gosudarstvenny Osoby Archiv USSR (Special Central Archive of the State of the USSR), referred to in German sources as Zentrales Staatsarchiv (Central State Archive) or Sonderarchiv (Special Archive), and in English sources as Osobyi Archive (Special Archive).³ It was renamed in 1999 to Rossisky Gosudarstvenny Vojenny Archiv (Russian State War Archive). Fleming did not visit this archive, but the Central State Archive on Pirogovskaya Street, i.e., the Gosudarstvenny Archiv Rossiskoy Federatsy (State Archive of the Russian Federation). Here were brought from the Viborgskaya Street archive “all the papers of special interest” to him, about 9,000 pages, and he viewed 85 percent of them. However, the Zentralbauleitung archive in fact has about 88,200 pages of documents.⁴ This fact reveals the limited scope of his research, which was more concerned with finding incriminating elements than with achieving a general view and real knowledge of the structure and operation of the Auschwitz Camp. Indeed, it is clear that he requested only those dela (files) such as 305-318 of fond (fund, collection) 502, opis (list, section) 1 – relating to the crematoria, in which he hoped to find “criminal traces.”

At the Gosudarstvenny Archiv Rossiskoy Federatsy, we located the documentation on the work of the Soviet Commission of Inquiry at Auschwitz (about 7,000 pages), in addition to other important documentary collections (such as a documentation on the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal). The interrogations of the Topf Company’s engineers, however, were not located there. They were not kept at the Tsentralnaya Khraneniya Istoriko-dokumental’nykh Kollektsey either, so we thought they might be found in the Russian Secret Service Archives. An attempt to gain access in 1995 failed because it required special permission that we did not have. In the spring of 2001, however, we learned that the documents in question were indeed kept there. Hence, we submitted a request to the archives of the “Federal Security Bureau of the Russian Federation” (Federal’naya Sluzhba Bezopasnosti Rossiskoy Federatsy: FSBRF) to view the aforementioned interrogation protocols. This request was granted six months later. In February 2002, Jürgen Graf was able to enter the archive, and photocopy the relevant records. They can be found in file N-19262. The reference given by Fleming – 17/9 – is a flawed transcription of the protocol number of the proceedings against Sander, Prüfer, Schultze and Braun (criminal case 1719).

It is quite unlikely that the errors regarding the archive’s name and the file location number were a mere oversight, all the more so since Fleming repeated them in his 1994 book. It is more plausible that, through this ruse, he had intended to mislead other researchers in order to remain the sole custodian of the documents.

⁴ I have described the archive’s filing system in Mattogno 2015, pp. 10f.

Fleming is also to be blamed for not reporting anything about the text of the minutes. In particular, he did not mention that they are written in Russian and mostly handwritten.⁵ That he viewed these very documents is in no doubt, as is clear from his citations, which refer precisely to these minutes in Russian.⁶ It is true that in his article “Engineers of Death” he mentioned fleetingly that the excerpts he presented were “translated from the Russian,” but not even this generic indication appears in his book. On the contrary, by sometimes adducing German words or expressions in parentheses in the extracts quoted, without giving any clarification,⁷ he gave the impression that the minutes in question were precisely in German.

In my opinion, this also had a very specific purpose: that of evading the complex issue arising from a re-translation from Russian of texts previously translated into Russian from German. It is clear that he was not capable of dealing with this issue, both because of his rather elementary knowledge of the history of the Auschwitz Camp, and because of his total ignorance of the history, structure and operation of the crematoria of this camp. This also explains why he limited himself to publishing brief excerpts from the minutes as a mere 26-page appendix to his book, even though he was basically the only person in the world with access to these documents at least until the year 2000,⁸ thanks to the contrivance mentioned earlier.

Another serious shortcoming of Fleming’s handling of this matter lies in the fact that he did not account for the actual substance of the documentary material. In his 1994 book, he presented excerpts from the following interrogations:

- Kurt Prüfer, 5 March (pp. 199-203) and 15 March 1946 (pp. 202f.), with a brief reference to the one on 19 March 1946 (p. 200, Note 9);
- Karl Schultze, 18 February (p. 210), 24 February (pp. 211f.) and 11 March 1948 (pp. 212-214);

⁸ A. Schüle reports that the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., made copies of the interrogation protocols available to Jean-Claude Pressac in 2000; the latter gave them to the Buchenwald Memorial in 2003, which had them translated into German (Schüle, Note 165, p. 50). However, there is no evidence that the interviews were ever published.

- Fritz Sander, 7 March (pp. 203-205) and 13 March 1946 (pp. 207-209), with a brief reference to the one on 21 March 1946 (p. 209);
- Gustav Braun’s extended interrogations are not mentioned at all.

However, Prüfer was subjected to as many as thirteen interrogations, Schultze to eight, Sander to three, and Braun to eleven, plus one interrogation with Prüfer and Braun together.⁹ Again, out of all this material, Fleming cherry-picked what he felt was important for his quest for “criminal traces” supporting the claim that homicidal gas chambers existed at Auschwitz.

Despite the obvious historical value of the interrogations of the four Topf engineers, orthodox Holocaust historiography did not care at all to delve into this issue, so that the major studies on Auschwitz published in the decade following Fleming’s discovery – from the anthologies Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp (Gutman/Berenbaum 1994) and Auschwitz 1940-1945 (Długoborski/Piper 1999/2000) to the monographs Auschwitz 1270 to the Present by Robert Jan van Pelt and Debórah Dwork, as well as The Case for Auschwitz by Robert Jan Van Pelt – don’t mention them at all.

The only exception to this is Annegret Schüle (2010). Just like Fleming, she also selectively used various excerpts from the Topf engineers’ interrogations in search for incriminating evidence. However, her excerpts were taken out of the overarching context, thus disallowing their general significance to be assessed. She moreover made numerous shrewd omissions. I have dedicated Chapter 11 of the present study to discussing her approach.

The most comprehensive account that has been published so far on the subject, which also presents a good general framing of the issue, still remains Jürgen Graf’s related 2002 German paper, whose title translates to “Anatomy of the Soviet Interrogation of the Topf Engineers. The Interrogation of Fritz Sander, Kurt Prüfer, Karl Schultze and Gustav Braun by Officers of the Soviet Counter-Espionage Organization Smersh (1946/1948).” The online version of this paper also contains Graf’s German translation of an almost complete set of interrogation protocols.¹⁰

In the present study, I present for the first time the complete protocols of Soviet interrogations of the Topf engineers in printed form, accompanied by a critical in-depth study that, for technical aspects, is based on my study of the crematoria at Auschwitz, which to this day remains the only one in existence in the entire field of Holocaust studies (Mattoigno/Deana).

2. The Company J.A. Topf and Sons of Erfurt¹¹

The Topf Company was founded in 1878 by Johann Andreas Topf (1816-1891), a master brewer who also worked on improving industrial incinerators. In 1884, his son Max Julius Ernst (1859-1914) joined the company, and the following year also his other son Wilhelm Louis, called Ludwig (1863-1914), so that on 1 April 1885 the company was renamed J.A. Topf & Sons. In the following years, the other two brothers joined the company: Albert (1857-1893) in 1886 and Gustav (1853-1896) in 1888. Ludwig remained the sole owner until his death by suicide on 15 February 1914. By a tragic irony of fate, his son, who bore the same name, also took his own life on 31 May 1945. Ludwig, the father, was a proponent of cremation, which was still in its infancy in Germany at the time. Consequently, he had himself cremated after his death. The ceremony took place on 18 February 1914, at the Gotha Crematorium. His two sons, Viktor Karl Ludwig (1903-1945) and Ernst Wolfgang (1904-1979), were still children at this time and did not take over the business until the 1930s: Ernst Wolfgang in 1929, followed by Ludwig in 1931. On 30 December 1935, the two brothers reorganized the company into a limited partnership.

At the beginning of the 1920s, Topf was known not only in Germany but also abroad. At that time, the company consisted of two main departments, one responsible for the design and construction of steam-boiler plants and the other for complete malting plants. The company's activities also extended to various firing equipment, such as mechanical firing apparatus (grate feeders), preheaters for the utilization of exhaust-gas heat, forced-draft devices, chimney constructions, industrial furnaces of all kinds, and cremation furnaces. Topf was very successful with its high-performance furnace with pre-gasification shaft for the economical combustion of lignite.

In the two decades that followed, Topf developed enormously and exported its products all over the world until the eve of the Second World War.

From 1878 to 1934, the Furnace Construction Department built about 30,000 furnaces (Feuerungs-Anlagen), including about 25,000 of its own

designs, for which it manufactured various types of grate bars, grates and spare parts.¹²

Between 1924 and September 1937, Topf had delivered or had been contracted in 3,710 cases to deliver items relating to 22 different types of malting equipment and storage facilities to Germany and abroad, including 39 silo gassing systems, about 700 barley, green-malt and malt worm conveyors and 375 barley, green-malt and malt elevators.¹³

In the field of cremation, the Topf Company began its activities on the eve of the First World War. In 1914, it built two furnaces with coke-fired gas generators at the Halle (Saale) Crematorium; another furnace of the same type was inaugurated at the Freiburg Municipal Crematorium on 15 April 1914; and another was installed at the Hirschberg Municipal Crematorium, which opened on 22 August 1915. From the early 1920s, the company began its slow but inexorable rise to become the market leader among German companies in this industry over the next two decades. By 1934, 74 cremation furnaces had been built, including three abroad (two in Moscow and one in Brussels). 29 coke-fired furnaces, 44 gas-fired furnaces and one electric furnace; four of the gas furnaces had been converted from former coke-fired furnaces. Contributing to this success was the fact that Topf soon achieved a very-advanced technological standard and manufactured high-quality equipment; it is credited with building Germany's first gas-fired cremation furnace in Dresden in 1927, as well as Germany's first electric cremation furnace, which went into operation in Erfurt in 1933. In 1934, Topf patented a new type of gas-fired furnace, the "High-performance furnace with tiltable grates D.R.P."¹⁴ or "Topf Cremation Furnace 1934," which was also capable of using electric heating.

Topf's research activity is also evidenced by the numerous patents granted to it, especially in the 1930s, some of which – such as the post-combustion grate and tiltable grate – introduced important innovations in cremation technology.

At the beginning of the 1940s, the Topf Company had a very complex structure. The twelve technical departments were divided into 99 sections, but these twelve departments occupied only numbers 74-85 of the company's total of 89 departments.¹⁵

The Topf engineers of interest in the context of the present study were:

- Kurt Prüfer, born in 1891, with the Topf Company from 1920, chief engineer since 2 December 1935,¹⁶ director of Subdepartment DIV, furnace construction, crematoria, waste-incineration furnaces and recovery furnaces for the recovery of metals.
- Karl Schultze, born in 1900 in Berlin, with the Topf Company from 1928, chief engineer, director of Department B, which dealt with heating, ventilation and fan construction.
- Fritz Sander, born in 1876 in Leipzig, with the Topf Company from 1910, chief engineer, proxy of Department D, which in its four subdepartments was engaged in boiler and furnace construction.

During the investigation of the criminal case brought against Prüfer by the Soviets, which will be discussed below, he personally drew a chart of the Topf Company's organizational structure, which he explained in a brief explanatory note (see Document 4 in the Appendix). According to this chart, the company was hierarchically structured as follows:¹⁷

- Ernst Wolfgang and Ludwig Topf, proprietors of the company
- administration office
- general planning, under the direction of Heinrich Mersch, and operations management, with Gustav Braun as head
- project preparation and standards office
- accounting, preliminary and final cost calculation, purchases and assembly office
- Department D – proxies: Fritz Sander and Paul Erdmann, with Subdepartments B (headed by Karl Schultz[e]), DI, DII, DIII, DIV (headed by Kurt Prüfer)
- Department E – proxies: Hermann and Kurt Schmidt, with Subdepartments A, C, EI, EII, EIII, EIV
- locksmith shop, lathe shop, furnace shop, welding shop, carpentry shop
- materials warehouse, motor pool and garage, shipping

Prüfer's explanations of the company structure, which he set down during his Soviet imprisonment, are to be found in Prüfer's criminal file compiled by the Soviets as a typewritten transcript peppered with errors and lacking umlauts, probably prepared by the Soviets on the basis of a handwritten text by Prüfer. It reads as follows:¹⁸

“Mr. TOPF, Ludwig and Ernst-Wolfgang were the owners and bosses of the company and managed it directly.

¹⁶ Prüfer was informed of the appointment in a letter dated December 2, 1935, marked “ET” (Ernst Topf). APMO, BW 30/46, p. 2.

¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 160-162.

Both gentlemen were in charge of selecting the orders to be produced by the company in the factory.

From here it was decided which orders should be accepted and which should be rejected.

The directly subordinate secretariat, staffed by two ladies, passed on the instructions of Mr. TOPF to the individual departments, and it was here that the incoming and outgoing mail was handled and the personnel matters of the employees were processed.

The General Plan Office examined the orders received, together with TOPF, on acceptance or rejection and, if accepted, assigned a level of priority. It was also here that the control tokens or bills were received and forwarded. This office was the most important in the company and was headed by Mr. MERSCH.

The plant director, as head of the entire plant (with the exception of the technical offices), had to supervise the handling of orders within the factory, and help determine which orders were urgent and which were unsuitable for the plant and had to be rejected. In addition, it was from here that the work was distributed to the individual operating units, and the method of production was discussed and determined. Workers were also accepted [hired] and dismissed here.

In the project preparation office, the machine parts to be manufactured were broken down into the individual operations, the costs for machining the parts were determined, i.e. the piecework wages were set, the parts lists and the shop drawings were checked and errors corrected, and it was checked which machine parts in stock were to be used.

This office reported directly to the plant director (BRAUN).

The standards office checked all drawings and parts lists prepared for the workshop for 'standard' and correctness, and especially for the correctness of the dimensions. This office was also under the direction of the plant director.

In the accounting department, all incoming and outgoing orders were entered into the books, and invoices were prepared.

The pre- and post-calculation checked the cost estimates and, after processing the individual machine parts, calculated the expenses and also the costs of manufacturing the machines, in order to finally determine the total costs and consequently the profit or loss.

This office was under the direction of Mr. TOPF.

In the assembly office, the assemblers for [the] individual construction sites were dispatched, and the assembly wages were determined and settled, the travel prices were prepared and the assembly duration was determined. In addition, the hand tools for the construction sites were assembled and sent off. This office was under the command of Director BRAUN.

The department head management (D) – headed by the directors and senior engineers SANDER and ERDMANN – supervised the individual Departments B-D₁-D₂-D₃-D₄, distributed the incoming mail handed over by Mr. TOPF, and consequently assigned the technical office work, checked the drawings and factory parts lists for correctness, and supervised the outgoing mail.

Department (D) handled steam-boiler hearths, bricking-in of boilers, boilers, aeration and deaeration systems, and furnaces of all designs, garbage and waste-incineration furnaces, industrial furnaces, cable incinerators and cremation furnaces, and factory chimneys

Department Management E – management by authorized signatories Hermann SCHMIDT and Kurt SCHMIDT, supervised the individual Departments A-C-E₁-E₂-E₃-E₄. This department processed brewery machinery and all machines necessary for malt production. Steel silos for grains of all kinds, whole malting plants and grain-drying plants. Both Departments (D and E) were under Mr. TOPF.

The plant, which consisted of a locksmith's shop, a lathe shop, a furnace shop, a welding shop, and a carpentry, employed about 650 workers, and here, by means of the existing machines, all the parts for the complete devices manufactured by the company and described above were made.

The raw iron and non-fabricated iron parts were stored in the materials warehouse and distributed according to need.

The sub-departments of transportation and shipping handled the machines finished for shipment in the factory.

The plant was under the direct supervision of Mr. TOPF and Director BRAUN.”

The organizational chart of the Topf Company dated 22 February 1943, however, shows a much-more-complex structure. The main departments, which were subdivided into numerous subdepartments, were thus as follows (reproduced in Schüle 2011, p. 167):

- Operations management with the two Topf brothers as bosses, including management and general administration
- commercial departments
- technical administration
- technical departments
- the operating department, including the plant production schedule, headed by Gustav Braun, the project-preparation department, and the plant floor;
- the assembly department

In 1940, the Topf Company reached its highest number of employees: 1,064 persons, of whom 766 were blue-collar workers and 298 white-collar employees (ibid., p. 78). After the beginning of the Second World War, foreign workers, prisoners of war and civilians were conscripted to the Topf Company. At the end of 1942, 270 of these conscripted workers worked for Topf, and in 1943 there were already 341 (ibid., p. 76). On December 31, 1943, the company had 840 employees.¹⁹ From an “employee report” of 31 January 1944, it appears that the Topf Company had 830 employees at that time, of whom 726 were men and 104 women, including 157 salaried employees and 198 skilled workers.

After the war, the Topf Company started its activities for the Soviet Office for War Reparations and Supplies of the Soviet Administration in Germany. In October 1945, it erected a waste-incineration furnace in Arnstadt.²⁰ An order dated February 19, 1946 for a “Cartox²¹ fumigation device for 5,000-ton storage” was completed on 30 May 1948 with the site-acceptance test of the plant.²²

In April 1948, the company was still called J.A. Topf & Sons, but was now a nationalized company with the “State Owner” Max Machemehl, the plant manager Herbert Bartels and Friedrich Schiller as head of the employee organization. Günter Mann was entrusted with the construction of cremation furnaces under the direction of engineer Hans Streichardt.²³

During the same year, the company was renamed Nagma Topfwerke Erfurt VEB, and the construction of cremation furnaces was relocated to Zwickau. In 1957, the company changed its name to “VEB Erfurter Mälzerei- und Speicherbau” (EMS) and was privatized in 1993 as “Erfurter Mälzerei- und Speicherbau GmbH” (EMS).

In 1951, Ernst Wolfgang Topf moved to Wiesbaden, where he reestablished the company J.A. Topf and Sons, but it was dissolved in 1963.

3. Topf Cremation Furnaces for Concentration Camps

The Topf Company's first contacts with the SS for the construction of cremation furnaces in concentration camps took place already before World War II. The company manufactured four types of furnaces, the history of which I describe briefly.²⁴

3.1. Mobile Oil-Fired Double-Muffle Cremation Furnace

The design for this furnace was prepared by Prüfer; its drawing, D55719, is dated 17 May 1939 (Schüle, p. 109). This model had originally been requested in May 1940 by the SS's Main Office Budget and Construction for the SS New Construction Office Auschwitz,²⁵ which later opted for a coke-fired plant, and also for the Flossenbürg Camp.²⁶ A furnace from the Kori Company was installed instead in the Flossenbürg crematorium.

In 1940, the SS administration of the Mauthausen and Dachau Camps ordered from the Topf Company a mobile cremation furnace heated with oil. The first one was commissioned from Topf by the SS New Construction Office of Mauthausen Camp on 21 March 1940, but it was decided on 9 October 1940 to change its heating system from oil to coke. The two coke-gas generators were installed during the construction of the furnace, which went into operation at the end of January 1941.²⁷ This device was installed at the Mauthausen subcamp Gusen. The furnace at Dachau Camp had been delivered even earlier, as shown by Topf's letter to this camp's SS New Construction Office dated 25 July 1940. Later, at an unspecified time, this device was also converted into a coke-fired furnace.

3.2. Coke-Fired Double-Muffle Cremation Furnace

On 18 June 1938, the Construction Office of the SS administration for the camps of Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen sent a request to Gruppenführer Eicke, head of Totenkopfverbände (Death-Head Units) and concentration camps, asking for authorization to build a crematorium at the Buchenwald Camp. Eicke passed it on to the head of the SS administration in Munich with a note in which he supported the request, because the increase in the Buchenwald Camp census had led to a corresponding increase in the number of deaths among the inmates, whose corpses had to be taken to the municipal crematorium at Weimar for cremation (Nuremberg Document NO-4353). The request was accepted, and authorization was granted by Main Office Budget and Construction in early December of 1939.

For the erection of this “emergency crematorium” (Notkrematorium) as it was called in the German administrative documents, the Topf Co. at Erfurt was contacted, and on 21 December 1939, Topf submitted to the cognizant authorities a cost estimate for “1 Topf incineration furnace, oil- or coke-fired, with double muffle and compressed-air unit, as well as a draft-enhancing unit” for the price of 7,753 RM plus 1,250 RM for the draft enhancer (NO-4448). Attached to this was the Drawing D56570 “double-muffle cremation furnace with oil burner,” drawn on the same day (NO-4444).

The “Description of the structure of the new emergency crematorium building in the camp for detainees of Buchenwald Concentration Camp,” written on 10 January 1940 by the New Construction Office at Buchenwald (NO-4401), refers to a small crematorium measuring 6 m × 9 m × 4 m, equipped with a two-muffle furnace.²⁸ There are no records on the implementation of this project, but according to former inmate Erich Haase, the first cremation furnace installed at the camp in the spring of 1940 had two muffles and was heated with coke (Kommunistische..., p. 80).

In 1940, the New Construction Office Buchenwald also commissioned Topf to build an oil-fired double-muffle cremation furnace. However, only testimonies from former inmates exist about this device.

For the Auschwitz crematorium, the Main Office Budget and Construction chose a coke-fired double-muffle furnace in the spring of 1940, which had been patented on 6 December 1939 as a “cremation furnace with double muffle.”²⁹ This device had already been proposed to the New Construction Office³⁰ at Auschwitz in April. The pertinent cost estimate (Kostenanschlag) of 17 April 1940 in fact referred to the “supply of a coke-fired Topf cremation furnace with two muffles and compressed-air unit, plus 1 Topf draft-enhancing unit.”³¹ On 10 June 1940, Topf sent to the New Construction Office Drawing D57253, executed the previous day, concerning a “Cremation furnace heated by coke and plan of the foundations.”

Topf’s installers arrived at Auschwitz in early July, and immediately set to work.³² Construction was completed in early August, and a test cremation was carried out on the 15th.³³

The need for a second double-muffle cremation furnace was brought to Topf’s attention by the head of the Auschwitz Construction Office, SS Untersturmführer August Schlachter, in a letter dated 7 November 1940.³⁴ On 13 November, Topf drew up two estimates concerning the second furnace, which was proposed for a price of 7,753 Reichsmarks.³⁵ After approval by Office II C2 of the Main Office Budget and Construction, requested by Schlachter on 22 November,³⁶ Topf prepared Drawing D57999 on the 30th of that month, which shows the layout of the second furnace in the crematorium.³⁷ Construction work began at the end of January with the pouring of the furnace foundation,³⁸ and was completed at the end of February.³⁹ The furnace went into operation in mid-March.

Towards the end of September, Topf received a verbal order for “a double-muffle Topf cremation furnace with blower, introduction cart and rotatable platform.”⁴⁰

The Topf cost estimate, dated 25 September, showed a price of 7,332 RM, solely for the furnace with the blower.⁴¹ The furnace parts, having a total weight of 3,548.5 kg, were shipped by Topf on 21 October.⁴² In late November, Topf's fitter Albert Mehr laid the foundation for the new furnace,⁴³ but then the work came to a halt, because Topf's supplier, the company Collmener Schamottewerke, had been unable to ship the refractory material for the new furnace due to a freight-car lockdown (Waggonsperre).⁴⁴ Work resumed in January 1942, and by the end of March 1942, the third furnace of the Auschwitz crematorium was ready.⁴⁵

On 16 October 1941, the New Construction Office of Mauthausen Camp commissioned Topf to build another coke-fired double-muffle cremation furnace, but hesitated for a long time before having it installed. The construction parts for the furnace were sent to Mauthausen between 6 February 1942 and 12 January 1943,⁴⁶ but the decision to set it up was made only in late 1944. We learn from a letter from Topf dated 20 December 1944 that preliminary work was in progress at the Mauthausen crematorium on the furnace foundation and the smoke duct. Topf was waiting for the completion of this work to send their own fitter.⁴⁷ On 3 January 1945, Topf announced the arrival of their fitter, Chief Engineer Schultze, for 9 January.⁴⁸ The furnace was thus built in January-February 1945.

3.3. Coke-Fired Triple-Muffle Cremation Furnace

In October 1941, the SS New Construction Office Auschwitz contacted the Topf Company about equipping the new crematorium it planned to build in the Main Camp, which later became Birkenau Crematorium II. On 21 and 22 October, Prüfer had a meeting with the new head of construction, SS Hauptsturmführer Karl Bischoff, who had taken over from Schlachter on 1 October. As a result of this meeting, the latter verbally ordered from Topf five triple-muffle furnaces with a blower each, two Topf forced-draft devices, each with about 10,000 m³ per hour, and a waste incinerator.⁴⁹ The actual order, accurately described in a Topf letter dated 4 November, covered: 5 Topf triple-muffle cremation furnaces with blowers, 2 coffin-introduction devices with rail system for 5 furnaces, 3 Topf forced-draft systems, 1 Topf waste incinerator, and the smoke-duct system.⁵⁰ The parts for the five triple-muffle furnaces at Crematorium II are listed in the Topf bills of lading of 16 April and 18 June 1942.⁵¹

Two triple-muffle cremation furnaces were moreover installed by the Topf Company in the Buchenwald Camp's crematorium, and went into operation even earlier than those at Birkenau: one around 29 August, and the other in early October.⁵²

In Birkenau Crematorium II, however, installation of the furnaces began during September 1942.⁵³ Work, including the flue ducts and the chimney, was finished in January 1943.⁵⁴ The crematorium went into operation on 20 February 1943.⁵⁵

The order for the furnaces for Crematorium III, placed by the Central Construction Office with Topf verbally on 25 September 1942, was confirmed in writing on the 30th. It covered five triple-muffle furnaces with five coffin introduction stretchers at a cost of 39,150 Reichsmark; three forced-draft systems at 9,048 Reichsmark; plus the refractory material for the smoke ducts at 5,504 Reichsmark; hence a total of 53,702 Reichsmark.⁵⁶

Construction of the cremation furnaces began at the end of March 1943.⁵⁷ Although the crematorium was scheduled to start operating on 10

April 1943, the work took more than three months. In fact, the document with which the building was officially handed over bears the date 24 June 1943.⁵⁸

In 1942, the Topf Company built two triple-muffle furnaces in the Gross-Rosen Camp on the basis of a 1941 project by Prüfer. The documents on this were in the possession of Soviet investigators in 1948, but they have been lost since.⁵⁹

3.4. Coke-Fired Eight-Muffle Furnace

For a PoW Camp in Mogilev, Main Office Budget and Construction ordered on 4 December 1941 from the Topf Company “4 pcs. Topf double-4-muffle incineration furnaces,” meaning four furnaces with eight muffles each.⁶⁰ Since coke was difficult to procure in this area, they were supplied with wood-burning hearths. Because of transportation difficulties, these devices were moreover designed without insulation. Topf confirmed receipt of the order on 9 December, but only half a furnace, i.e., four muffles, was sent to Mogilev on 30 December.⁶¹

Accepting the suggestion made by Prüfer when he visited Auschwitz on 19 August 1942, the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office decided on 26 August to send two of the furnaces ordered for Mogilev to Auschwitz instead.

In accordance with Topf’s offer of 2 September concerning the changes in the type of fuel and the corresponding modifications, the Central Construction Office ordered on 15 September four wrought-iron covers for the hearths with frames, spiral handles and refractory lining, as well as 2,500 insulating bricks and 600 kg of rock wool for each of the furnace’s insulation, plus the replacement bars for the hearths of the gasifiers, at a total price of 3,258 Reichsmarks.⁶² As the two furnaces had altogether eight gasifiers, there were eight covers and not four, as Topf was quick to rectify.⁶³

In practice, of the four eight-muffle furnaces ordered, half a furnace (four muffles) had gone to Mogilev, two were at Auschwitz, and the remaining furnace-and-a-half was held in a Topf warehouse at the disposition of Reichsführer-SS.⁶⁴ On 16 August, the SS-Wirtschafter (business manager) at Higher SS and Police Leader (Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer) of the Government General sent a note to the Central Construction Offices at Heidelager, Krakow, Lemberg, Lublin and Warsaw, as well as to the New Construction Office at Radom, explaining that “Office CIII has currently at its disposal a cremation furnace and a half = 12 muffles,” and asked to be informed by 1 September whether the offices mentioned had any use for them.⁶⁵

As Prüfer reported to Soviet investigators, one furnace was shipped to the Krakow Station, and another (the remaining half furnace) remained in Topf’s warehouses.⁶⁶

3.5. Summary

To recap, the Topf Company built the following cremation furnaces for German concentration camps:

Table 1: Topf Cremation Furnaces in German Concentration Camps
(see also Table IV in the Appendix)

TYPE	#	MUFFLES	LOCATION	CONSTR. YEAR
oil-fired mobile double-muffle	1	2	Dachau	1940
	1	2	Buchenwald	1940
	1	2	Gusen	1940 – 1941

	4	16	Birkenau	9/1942 – 4/1943
	2	8	Krakow	1943
	1	4	Topf Warehouse

Hence, a total of 30 furnaces with altogether 90 muffles.

4. Arrest and Conviction of the Topf Engineers

Prüfer was arrested by U.S. intelligence officers on 30 May 1945, but was released on 13 June. Ludwig Topf committed suicide on 31 May. On 3 July, the American occupation forces were replaced by Soviet ones. On 11 October, Braun drafted in the third person a file memo concerning Prüfer’s personal files, which I translate in full:⁶⁷

“A Red Army soldier visited us at lunchtime today and asked about Mr. Prüfer. He wanted to speak to Mr. Prüfer. Braun told him that Mr. Prüfer was not here today, but was in Arnstadt to carry out a construction inspection, as we were building a waste incineration furnace there for the Russian military government. – The Russian asked if Prüfer was ‘the right-hand man’. Braun explained to him that this was not the correct term, but that Prüfer was the head of our furnace-construction department. The Russian went on to ask whether we were [a] furnace construction company. Braun told him that our company was a machine factory. Another question was whether Prüfer carried out any other work. Braun replied that he was a specialist in this field and that, in addition to the Arnstadt waste incineration furnace, we had to build a similar one for the Blumenthal barracks in Erfurt. He also asked about the crematoria. Braun told him that we were not only building these furnaces for Erfurt, but for the whole world, including one for Russia. He also wanted to know whether similar orders had been carried out by the Americans during the occupation, to which Braun replied in the affirmative, and pointed out that we had been commissioned to build a furnace for the city of Erfurt with the approval of the military government and the Lord Mayor.

The Russian then went on to say: The one Topf is evidently dead. Braun replied in the affirmative. He asked why he had died. He was told that Mr. Topf had passed away as a result of general nervousness (he was ‘down’ with his nerves, so to speak). This nervousness manifested itself already about a year ago in the form of ranting here and issuing orders there, which he sometimes withdrew the next day, etc. – in other words, a general nervousness that ultimately degenerated into an untenable state. – Then he asked about the other Mr. Topf. He was informed that the two gentlemen had mutually concluded a contract that one or the other would be entitled to an insurance sum in the event of the other's death, in order to be able to continue the business, because it is generally assumed that in such a case certain stagnations can occur. He traveled to Stuttgart or Frankfurt because he himself had to conduct the negotiations in this matter. He had the approval of the military government and the Lord Mayor of the city of Erfurt for this trip. – We expect Mr. Topf back in the near future, as the negotiations have dragged on for some time.

He then wanted to know what else we were making. He saw the picture of Müller, Brake. – Braun told him that we were building all of these facilities. He also asked whether elevators were also installed in these facilities, to which we replied in the affirmative. We were also working on food and malting facilities, but he wasn't interested in that.

He wants to come back here tomorrow morning at 8:00 to discuss something with Mr. Prüfer. He didn't tell us what he wanted or wanted to discuss with Mr. Prüfer."

In early March 1946, Prüfer, Schultze, Sander and Braun were arrested by the Soviets. The arrest warrants were issued on 6 March by the head of the Smersh⁶⁸ Counterintelligence Service, Colonel Zagorulony, and military prosecutor Colonel Zhmirov, of the 8th Guard Army. The four engineers were suspected of the crimes specified in Part One of the decree of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR dated 19 April 1943, which concerned "Punitive measures for German-Fascist criminals guilty of killing and torturing the Soviet civilian population and prisoners of war, for spies, traitors to the motherland among Soviet citizens and their accomplices." The validity of the decree was extended retroactively to the beginning of the war. It imposed the death penalty by hanging, or hard labor for fifteen to twenty years for crimes committed against Soviet citizens (Ginsburgs, p. 45). The arrest warrant was formally executed on 7 March, the date under which the four engineers viewed and signed it.⁶⁹ However, Schultze and Braun were first interrogated on 4 March, so Pressac is certainly correct that this was the actual day of the four engineers' arrest (Pressac 1993, p. 95): Hence; the aforementioned arrest warrants only served to legalize a fait accompli.

⁶⁸ Acronym for smert shpionam, death to spies.

The defendants underwent a total of 36 interrogations, of them 20 in Berlin between 4 and 28 March 1946, plus 16 more in Moscow between 11 February and 11 March 1948.

On 28 March 1946, Smersh Captain Kazantsev signed an “Order terminating prosecution due to death of defendant” for Sander. We read there, among other things:⁷⁰

“In the office of the counter-intelligence service ‘Smersh’ in Germany on 25 March 1946, defendant Fritz Sander was delivered in critical health, with signs of heart failure and symptoms of swelling in the lungs and lower extremities as a result of severe exhaustion. The sick man was given medical attention, however, despite the measures taken, the inmate Fritz Sander died on 26 March at 3 p.m. Based on the above, according to Article 4 Paragraph 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Federative Russian Socialist Soviet Republic, the prosecution of the defendant Fritz Sander, son of Karl, is dismissed due to the death of the defendant.”

On 15 March 1948, Criminal Case No. 1719 against the remaining three Topf engineers was closed with the following request for conviction, signed by three senior officers of the State Security Service:⁷¹

“Based on what has been set forth,^[72] the following are charged:

Prüfer, Kurt, born 1891 in Erfurt, Germany, German citizen, employee, since 1933 member of the Nazi Party, civil engineer, married, until his arrest residing in Bischleben, near Erfurt, and employed by the Topf und Söhne machine-building company as head of the design and construction department for heating and cremation equipment.

He is charged that:

In carrying out the orders of the SS authorities from 1940 to 1944, he personally directed the work of building and equipping crematoria and gas chambers in which mass extermination of enslaved citizens of the Soviet Union, Poland and other countries was carried out by Fascist Germany, i.e., crimes that are covered in the first part of the decree of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR [of 19 April 1943].

Schultze, Karl, born 1900 in Berlin, German, German citizen, employee, no party member, civil engineer, married, until his arrest residing in Erfurt and employed in the design department of the firm Topf und Söhne as head of the ventilation systems department.

He is charged that:

On behalf of the SS authorities from 1940 to 1944 he designed special ventilation systems for crematoria in order to increase the capacity of the crematoria that were built by the firm Topf und Söhne in the concentration camps, and he also personally participated in the Auschwitz death camp in the equipping of the gas chambers, in which inmates were killed with gas, i.e., crimes that are covered in the first part of the decree of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR.

Braun, Gustav, born 1889 in Heilbronn, Germany, German citizen, employee, civil engineer, married, until his arrest residing in Erfurt and employed as company manager in the Topf und Söhne machine factory.

He is charged that:

From 1940 to 1944 in the factory of the Topf und Söhne company he ensured the execution of orders given by the SS authorities for the production of items to equip the crematoria and gas chambers that had been built by the aforementioned company in the concentration camps. He mistreated Soviet citizens whom the Germans had sent from the occupied territories of the Soviet Union to forced labor in the Topf und Söhne firm.

In 1941, as the representative of the counterintelligence delegate in the Topf und Söhne Company's factory, he directed counterintelligence activities to combat anti-fascist acts by workers and employees, about which he informed the authorities of the Security Service and the Gestapo, i.e., he committed crimes that are covered by Paragraph 58-4 of the Criminal Code of the Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.

Pursuant to Paragraph 208 of the Criminal Code of the Soviet Federative Socialist Republic, Criminal Case 1719 – the indictment against Prüfer Kurt, Schultze Karl and Braun Gustav – is forwarded for trial to the Special Chamber at the Ministry of National Security of the USSR.

For the defendants Prüfer Kurt, Schultze Karl and Braun Gustav, a sentence of 25 years of hard labor is proposed.

The sentencing petition was issued in Moscow on 15 March 1948.”

On 3 April, an “Ordinance for sending them to a special camp of the Ministry of Internal Affairs” was issued against the three engineers, imposing a sentence of 25 years.

Prüfer died on 24 October 1952. Schultze and Braun were released on the basis of a decree by the Supreme Presidium of Soviets of 28 September 1955.

On 30 June 1992, the State Prosecutor's Office of the Russian Federation decided not to rehabilitate the three convicted engineers. The “Decision on Non-Rehabilitation in Criminal Proceedings File Number N-19262 in the Case of Prüfer and Others” concluded as follows:⁷³

“Prüfer, Schultze, and Braun pleaded guilty. Their guilt relating to the design and construction of instruments for the mass extermination of people in concentration camps is proven by the statements of co-defendants Sander [...], Koch [...], Erdmann [...] and others, by technical documentation, ⁷³ Ibid., pp. 463f.

by correspondence with SS authorities, and also by the materials of the Extraordinary State Commission for the Investigation and Prosecution of the Misdeeds of the German-Fascist Invaders. [...]

Also decisive for this prosecution are the statements of former Auschwitz commandant Rudolf Höss, who described exactly the mechanism of the extermination of hundreds of thousands of people by means of gas chambers and crematoria. [...] Based on the above and in accordance with Paragraphs 4 and 8 of the Law of the Federative Socialist Soviet Republic ‘On the Rehabilitation of Victims of Political Repression’ of 18 October 1991, I propose:

to recognize that Prüfer Kurt, Schultze Karl and Braun Gustav were justly convicted in the relevant criminal proceedings, and are not subject to rehabilitation. [...]

The prosecutor in the rehabilitation section of the General Prosecutor’s Office of the Russian Federation.

A.I. Iodadis”

I will examine the merits of this decision in the Conclusion of the present study.

5. The Interrogation Protocols in their Historical Context

By March 1946, the historical propaganda picture of Auschwitz had been irrevocably fixed in its essentials for several months. The “Extraordinary State Commission for the Investigation and Prosecution of the Misdeeds of the German-Fascist Invaders and their Accomplices on the Enormous Atrocities and Crimes of the German Government at Auschwitz” had concluded its investigation in March 1945. Locations were inspected, German documents and plans examined, and 207 witnesses questioned. Among them were some who were crucial to the description of the camp’s alleged extermination facilities, such as Szlama Dragon and Henryk Tauber.⁷⁴ Furthermore, dozens of “expert reports” were compiled, beginning with the one that sanctioned the mythical 4-million death-toll number.

The results of the investigations were summarized as early as 19 March 1945 in a 55-page report titled “Conclusions of the Investigation of German-Fascist Misdeeds at the Auschwitz-Oswiecim Concentration Camp.”⁷⁵

⁷⁴ I have scrutinized the statements of these two witnesses in Mattogno 2022.

⁷⁵ GARF, 7021-108-29, pp. 1-55.

In April 1945, the famous report was drafted that was published in Pravda on 7 May 1945,⁷⁶ and later became Nuremberg Document USSR-008.⁷⁷ In the course of their investigation, the Soviet Commission of Inquiry had examined the archives of the Auschwitz Central Construction Office. Hence, they understood the important role played by the Topf Company and its engineers in equipping the crematoria at Auschwitz and Birkenau. Since – according to the conclusions of the Soviet investigators – homicidal gas chambers had existed inside the crematoria, the Topf engineers, in their eyes, were guilty of installing both the cremation furnaces and the alleged gas chambers there. The report explicitly refers to these charges:⁷⁸

“The German company Topf & Sons in Erfurt was awarded the contract to build four powerful new crematoria and gas chambers in Birkenau. Berlin pressed for acceleration, and demanded that all work be completed by the beginning of 1943. The Auschwitz Camp’s office files contain detailed correspondence between the camp administration and the Topf & Sons Company, including the following letter: [...]⁷⁹”

There were 12 incineration furnaces with 46 retorts in four new crematoria. Each retort could hold three to five corpses. The cremation process took about 20 to 30 minutes. The baths for special purposes,^[80] i.e. the gas chambers for killing people, were located in basements or special buildings next to the crematoria. There were also two separate ‘baths’ where the bodies were burned in special outdoor fires. Dogs helped to herd the people destined to die into the ‘baths.’ On the way, they were beaten with clubs and pistons. The doors of the chambers were hermetically sealed, and the people inside were poisoned with ‘Zyklon.’ Death occurred within 3-5 minutes. After 20-30 minutes, the bodies were removed and taken to the crematoria.”

The report published in Pravda had a final paragraph in which, among the German criminals who should be tried and punished, was “Chief Engineer Prüfer of the firm Topf and Sons” (Pravda, 7 May 1945, p. 3).

The Allied press immediately echoed this report, which was translated and published in several languages.

⁷⁹ This is followed by the text of the letter by Topf to Central Construction Office dated 12 February 1943, and an excerpt from Fritz Ertl’s file memo dated 21 August 1942, to which I will return later.

⁸⁰ Retranslation of the original term “Badeanstalten für Sonderaktionen,” “bathing establishments for special operations.”

By March 1946, the Soviet report on Auschwitz had become a historical-propagandic dogma: what defendant would dare to challenge it? This shines through explicitly in Schultze's interrogation on 11 March 1948, when Lieutenant Colonels Doperchuk and Novikov put the following question to him:

"We present to you the report of the commission of experts dated 14 February to 8 March 1945, from which it appears that in the Auschwitz Death Camp, in addition to the gas chambers in the crematoria, there were also separately constructed gas chambers. Tell what part the firm 'Topf' had and what part you personally had in the construction and setting up of these gas chambers."

The interrogations of Kurt Prüfer, Karl Schultze, Fritz Sander, and Gustav Braun by Soviet investigators from the Smersh counterintelligence service took place in this climate, which must be kept in mind in order to understand and evaluate the defendants' responses. Understandably, they adopted the line of defense that they considered tactically most profitable to escape a death sentence: accepting the investigators' thesis completely without ever challenging it directly, and professing to be completely guilty of the crimes ascribed, modeled on the infamous Stalinist show trials in Moscow. However, as we shall see, Kurt Prüfer and Karl Schultze indirectly contested one of the basic tenets of that thesis, and this, together with the reaction – or rather lack of any reaction – by the Soviet investigators, is one of the most interesting aspects of the whole affair.

6. The Chronological Context

In order to understand and evaluate Prüfer's and Schultze's statements, the engineers directly involved in equipping the crematoria at Birkenau, it is first necessary to establish the chronological context to which they refer, i.e., the exact dates of their visits to Auschwitz, because both of them provided general and inaccurate information in this regard. Prüfer in fact stated:⁸¹

"As an engineer and head of the crematorium-construction department, I went to Auschwitz five times. The first time was at the beginning of 1943, to receive instructions from the SS on where to build the crematorium. The second time in the spring of 1943, to inspect the site and examine the reason for erecting the crematorium chimney. The third time in the fall of ⁸¹ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 5 March 1946.

1943; I was requested to come by the SS leadership because errors had occurred during the construction of the crematorium chimney. The fourth time at the beginning of 1944, to examine the crematorium chimney, whose inner refractory brickwork was beginning to crumble. The fifth time in September/October 1944; I was ordered by the SS leadership to dismantle the crematoria of the Auschwitz Camp and to carefully pack up the equipment and the brickwork so that they could be transferred to another location.”

He later added that he also traveled to Auschwitz “[i]n the spring of 1942” in order to “review the project for the planned construction of a new crematorium in the Auschwitz camp sector.”⁸²

Schultze claimed to have visited Auschwitz only twice:

*“I was twice in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. Once in connection with a calculation error for the ventilation – this was in the spring of 1943 – and the second time about two months later to put the ventilation inside a newly built crematorium into operation.”*⁸³

The documents show the following.

Topf’s letter to the SS New Construction Office Auschwitz dated 13 November 1940 announced Prüfer’s arrival in Auschwitz for the 19th of the month.⁸⁴ On 22 November 1940, the head of construction, SS Untersturmführer August Schlachter, confirmed this in a letter to the Main Office Budget and Construction, Office C2, with the subject “Crematorium expansion”:⁸⁵

“The expansion of the facility was discussed on site with Mr. Prüfer, Chief Engineer at Topf & Söhne, and the extension can be carried out under favorable conditions.”

On 11 October 1941, the SS Construction Office Auschwitz sent the following telegram to Topf:⁸⁶

“Expecting a visit from your Mr. Prüfer at the beginning of next week due to the construction of a new crematorium. Please tell us when Prüfer will arrive.”

To which the Erfurt firm responded:⁸⁷

“Prüfer arrives twenty-first 9 o’clock.”

On 22 October, Prüfer met in Auschwitz with Head of Construction Karl Bischoff, SS Hauptsturmführer at the time,⁸⁸ and discussed with him the supply of five triple-muffle furnaces, two forced-draft devices and one garbage incinerator for the new crematorium (the future Crematorium II).⁸⁹ A letter from Topf dated 31 October confirms that the conversation between Prüfer and Bischoff had taken place “on the 21st and 22nd of the month.”⁹⁰ This was Prüfer’s second visit to Auschwitz.

On 21 November 1941, Prüfer wrote a letter to Bischoff, in which he informed him:⁹¹

“As you have already been informed by my company, I will be there shortly and will bring you in person the complete foundation plans as well as the anchoring drawings.”

In the following days, Prüfer actually went to Auschwitz, because on 3 December, Bischoff sent to the head of Office BII of the Main Office Budget and Construction in Berlin two drawings relating to the design of the new crematorium, which had evidently been given to him by Prüfer.⁹²

Prüfer’s next visit to Auschwitz was in August 1942. On 17 August, Topf sent the Central Construction Office a laconic telegram stating:⁹³

“Prüfer arrives Wednesday.”

A file memo by SS Untersturmführer Fritz Ertl dated 21 August 1942 confirms Prüfer’s presence in Auschwitz on 19 and 20 August:

“Mr. Prüfer appeared before the local office on 19 Aug. 1942 at 2 p.m.,...”

The next day he was still in Auschwitz.⁹⁴

On 29 January 1943, Prüfer inspected Crematorium II and the sites of the other three crematoria under construction, and wrote his well-known “inspection report.”⁹⁵

A few days later, Bischoff sent Topf a telegram of the following content:

“Due to extensive and urgent construction work, the presence of Chief Engineer Prüfer is absolutely necessary for 2-3 days every week. Wire back approval.”

In their reply, after quoting the text of this telegram, Topf assured that they were happy to send their engineer to Auschwitz.⁹⁶

On 5 February, Topf announced Prüfer's presence in Auschwitz "in a little while";⁹⁷ in its letter of 12 February, they specified that Prüfer would arrive "on Monday the 15th of this month in the afternoon".⁹⁸ On 22 February, Topf confirmed the presence in Auschwitz of their engineer "during the past week."⁹⁹ Topf's note of 17 February reports a communication by Prüfer "that he has to stay a few more days in Auschwitz."¹⁰⁰

Accompanied by Schultze, Prüfer went to Auschwitz again on 24 and 25 March 1943.¹⁰¹ Bischoff's letter to Topf dated 19 June 1943 reports:¹⁰²

"Already during the last visit of your Mr. Prüfer in April..."

The visit took place between 4 and 9 April,¹⁰³ but it was not the last one. On 11 May, the Central Construction Office requested by "urgent telegram" to Topf Prüfer's presence,¹⁰⁴ and they reiterated on 14 May:¹⁰⁵

"Presence of Chief Engineer Prüfer absolutely necessary immediately."

Civilian employee Rudolf Jährling telephoned Topf and learned that Prüfer was "in the Rhineland on a business trip," and that he would arrive in Auschwitz "on Monday," meaning 17 May.¹⁰⁵ Topf's letter of 9 June 1943 actually confirms a¹⁰⁶

"Meeting between your Mr. Sturmbannführer Bischoff and our Mr. Chief Engineer Prüfer on 18 May of this year."

Topf's letter of 25 May 1943 states:¹⁰⁷

"Reference to the recent visit of our Chief Engineer Prüfer and the conversation [...] with your dear Mr. Sturmbannführer Head of Construction Bischoff and Engineer Jährling."

The visit probably took place on 23 May, because the next day Prüfer was back in Erfurt and had a phone conversation with Bischoff.¹⁰⁸

Prüfer visited Auschwitz again on 10 September 1943.¹⁰⁹ On 30 January 1944, his presence was again requested by the Central Construction Office in a telegram to Topf that began as follows:¹¹⁰

“March off Chief Engineer Prüfer and Fitter Koch to here immediately...” They arrived in Auschwitz on 2 February. In fact, on that date, SS Obersturmführer Werner Jothann, the new head of the Central Construction Office, wrote to the camp commandant, SS Obersturmbannführer Arthur Liebehenschel, a letter with the subject line “Camp-access permits for Mr. Chief Engineer Prüfer and Mr. Holick of the company Topf and Sons, Erfurt.”¹¹¹

A handwritten list of orders commissioned from J.A. Topf, which was drawn up by the Central Construction Office on 2 December 1944, shows the invoice date, the amount in RM and the description. The last entry, dated 2 December 1944,¹¹² is an invoice for RM 232.50 for “Travel expenses for Chief Engineer Prüfer.”¹¹³

This is Kurt Prüfer’s last documented visit to Auschwitz, and evidently refers to his assignment to dismantle and pack up the cremation-furnace components. If we follow his statements, this lasted from September through October 1944, but October is much more likely.

Schultze, on the other hand, visited Auschwitz at least three times. Topf’s note of 17 February 1943 states that Schultze was in Auschwitz together with Prüfer, and was to return to the company on the following Friday, i.e., on the 19th.¹¹⁴ The second visit probably took place on 1 March 1943, as was announced by Topf in its letter to the Central Construction Office of 24 February 1943.¹¹⁵ The third visit took place on 24 and 25 March 1943 together with Prüfer.

In summary, Prüfer went to Auschwitz at least thirteen times:

1. on 19 November 1940
2. on 22 October 1941
3. between 23 October and 2 December 1941
4. on 19 and 20 August 1942

Schultze went to Auschwitz only three times:

3. on 24 and 25 March 1943.

I will next examine the reasons for the most important visits in their respective contexts.

7. Kurt Prüfer's and Karl Schultze's "Confessions" about the "Gas Chambers" of Auschwitz-Birkenau

In the course of their interrogations, Prüfer and Schultze made important admissions about the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz Main Camp and Birkenau. It is unclear, however, whether these are based on actual experiences, or were mere tactical concessions to the Soviet investigators' immutable dogmas. Let us therefore examine these admissions according to the chronology of the alleged events.

7.1. The "Gas Chamber" of Crematorium I, Main Camp

On 4 March 1948, Prüfer was questioned about the alleged homicidal gas chamber at Auschwitz Main Camp's Crematorium I. The interrogation went as follows:¹¹⁶

Question: Was there a gas chamber at Crematorium No. 1 in the camp sector Auschwitz?

Answer: Yes, there was one.

Question: Who set up this gas chamber?

Answer: I don't know exactly, but I assume that the gas chamber at the first crematorium in Auschwitz was set up by the Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp itself.

¹¹⁶ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 4 March 1948.

Question: When and how did you find out that there was a gas chamber at the first crematorium in Auschwitz?

Answer: I learned about it by chance in 1942 under the following circumstances: In the spring of 1942, at the request of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp, I traveled to Auschwitz to review the project for the planned construction of a new crematorium in the Auschwitz camp sector, to present my conclusions, and also to visit the site where the construction of this crematorium was planned. I visited the planned construction site accompanied by an SS man. As we passed the first crematorium, I looked through the half-open door into one of the rooms of the crematorium building, and saw human corpses lying on the floor in various positions. There were more than ten of them. As I approached this room, someone quickly slammed the door from the inside. As I did not know the purpose of this room in Crematorium No. 1, I asked the SS man accompanying me about it. The latter replied that a gas chamber had been set up in this room, and that prisoners were being poisoned with gas there. To my subsequent question as to how this gas chamber worked, the SS man replied evasively that he did not know exactly, but he told me that he knew that there were gas chambers in the city of Łódź where the SS men killed prisoners with exhaust fumes from car engines, but then they had made improvements to speed up the killing process, and started using some kind of gas. As the SS man explained, the killing process was shortened from 10 to 15 minutes to one to two minutes as a result of the use of gases in the Łódź gas chambers. According to the SS man, the killing process in the Łódź gas chambers was as follows: the prisoners were chased into the gas chambers, the doors were hermetically sealed, and then bottles of gas were thrown through special openings. Based on this account, I concluded that the prisoners were also murdered in the same way in the gas chamber built by the SS men at Crematorium No. 1 in Auschwitz.”

I first note that the time frame given by Prüfer is incorrect: he went to Auschwitz to discuss with Bischoff the design of the new crematorium (the future Crematorium II) between late October and late November 1941, not “[i]n the spring of 1942.” At that time, the alleged mass extermination had not yet begun, if we follow the orthodox narrative. Until early December 1941, after the phantom “first gassing,” Danuta Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle mentions only one gassing: 900 Soviet PoWs on 16 September 1941 (Czech 1990, p. 90).

The story told by Prüfer is therefore completely fictional.

In fact, he claims to have seen “more than ten” corpses when gazing “through a half-open door” into a room of the crematorium – that is, into the morgue, as reflected in his later identification of this room as the “gas chamber.” Prüfer claimed not to have known at the time the purpose of this room, which is a lie. As I pointed out earlier, he had gone to Auschwitz as early as 19 November 1940 to discuss “on site” the “expansion of the facility,” that is, the construction of the second double-muffle cremation furnace. He inspected the furnace room to determine together with the deputy head of construction, SS Rottenführer Walter Urbanczyk, the location of this new furnace. On the basis of this inspection, the Topf Company drew Plan D57999 on 30 September 1940, which shows precisely the location of the second furnace.

On that occasion, Prüfer also inspected the morgue. In fact, as shown in Topf’s letter of 9 December 1940, which refers to the conversation between Prüfer and Urbanczyk on 19 November 1940, the SS New Construction Office had ordered from Topf a “deaeration system for the corpse cells and the autopsy room.”¹¹⁷ The “cost estimate” for this system was likewise prepared on 9 December 1940.¹¹⁸ The term “corpse cells” referred to the morgue, which at that time was still part of a larger room that was later split by a partition into two rooms, the smaller one of which was then used to store urns. Attached to the aforementioned Topf letter was a version of Drawing D57999 showing “the routing of the extraction air pipe, and the installation of the fan,”¹¹⁹ which had been established on the basis of Prüfer’s inspection. Prüfer himself admitted this in the very interrogation of 4 March 1948 when stating:

“Initially, the company Topf and Sons built one double-muffle incinerator in the crematorium in question, and then – in early 1941 – the SS Construction Office of Auschwitz raised the question of increasing the capacity of this crematorium with the company, after which another double-muffle incinerator was installed there at my suggestion. In addition, at my personal suggestion, a blower was installed for these two furnaces, thanks to which the draft in the furnaces was increased, and the incineration accelerated, which also increased the capacity of the incineration furnaces. The drawings and technical plans for this blower were prepared by chief engineer Karl Schultze, and the assembly work for its installation was carried out on Schultze’s instructions by a company fitter who traveled to the Auschwitz Camp especially for this purpose. I personally drew up technical plans and drawings for the cremation furnaces mentioned above, and also carried out the technical supervision of the work on their construction.”

(Emphasis added)

Returning to Prüfer’s account, how can one seriously believe that a cremation-furnace designer who had overseen the installation of three double-muffle furnaces in the Auschwitz crematorium and had taken the order for a “deaeration system” for the “morgue” was surprised to see “more than ten” corpses in this same room?

More importantly, the morgue of Crematorium I was actually invisible from the outside. In fact, the front door of the crematorium opened onto an antechamber, from which the morgue was accessed either through the furnace room or through the “washing room” for corpses. Therefore, when passing in front of the crematorium, Prüfer could not have seen the interior of the morgue “through a half-open door,” which confirms that his testimony was freely invented.

The alleged response of the SS soldier accompanying Prüfer is completely misplaced and outlandish. Instead of answering, as would have been true and logical, that the room was a morgue, this soldier, who was bound to secrecy, is said to have instantly blurted out to Prüfer the alleged “secret” of Auschwitz. But the “secret” was such that the SS soldier did not even know how the alleged “gas chamber worked.” Yet he knew perfectly well how the phantom “gas chambers” at the distant city of Łódź worked, for which no such facilities have ever been claimed by anyone else!

In fact, the orthodoxy claims that the Jews living and working in the Łódź Ghetto were deported from there in the summer of 1944 to the Chełmno and Auschwitz Camps in order to be gassed there, precisely because the Łódź Ghetto had no means to exterminate these Jews.¹²⁰

The murder method allegedly used – throwing in some “bottles of gas” through an opening – is reminiscent of several post-war assertions about bombs, cylinders, cartridges or capsules of gas having been thrown into the alleged gas chamber for the claimed gas murder at Auschwitz (Academic..., p. 610). This stands in stark contrast to the orthodoxy’s claim – already firmly manifested by the time Prüfer made this statement in 1948 – that the murder is said to have been committed by pouring in Zyklon-B gypsum granules from tin cans.

This all shows that Prüfer was inventing things from whole cloth as he unfolded his narrative.

¹²⁰ See my detailed analysis of the fate of the Jews deported in 1944 from the Lodz Ghetto in Mattogno 2023b.

7.2. The “Bunkers” of Birkenau

During Prüfer’s interrogation of 13 March 1948, Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk dwelt on a file memo written by Fritz Ertl on 21 August 1942. Under Point 2, this document states:¹²¹

“With regard to the installation of 2 three-muffle furnaces each at the ‘bathing establishments for special operations,’ it was suggested by Engineer Prüfer that the furnaces be diverted from an already prepared delivery to Mogilev [i.e. an 8-muffle furnace], and the head of department, who was present at the SS Economic Administrative Main Office in Berlin, was immediately informed of this by telephone, and asked to arrange the further steps.”

The interrogation about this unfolded as follows:

“Question: At a meeting with the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp, which took place on 19 August 1942, the question of the installation of two three-muffle furnaces in the ‘bathing establishments for special operations’ was discussed with you. Explain which ‘bathing establishments for special operations’ were discussed at this meeting!

Answer: This meeting was about the installation of two three-muffle furnaces near the gas chambers that had been built by the SS men in Birkenau, completely separate from the crematoria built in that sector of the camp. I don’t know exactly where these gas chambers were, because I was never in the area where they were located and never saw them.

Based on the statements of a prisoner who worked as chief stoker of the crematoria in Auschwitz, I know that these gas chambers were three kilometers away from the Birkenau crematoria, and that the bodies of the prisoners murdered with gas in them were cremated on pyres. I would like to add to these statements by saying that no cremation furnaces were built near these gas chambers.”

Ertl’s file memo of 21 August 1942 had immediately received the attention of the Soviet Commission of Inquiry. However, only its Point 2 was translated into Russian, which concerns “bathing establishments for special operations” (rendered as “ban’ dlya osobovo naznachenya” = baths for special purpose), and inexplicably also the first paragraph of Point 4, which refers to the mistaken shipment to Auschwitz of parts of a double-muffle furnace intended for the Mauthausen Camp.¹²² The Commission decided ex cathedra that the “bathing establishments for special operations” were homicidal gas chambers that were somehow related to Crematoria IV and V.

¹²² GARF, 7021-108-14, p. 27.

In fact, in a report on the alleged extermination installations at Auschwitz-Birkenau dated 14 February to 8 March 1945, at the end of the paragraph concerning the above-mentioned two crematoria, we read:¹²³

“It is characteristic that, in official correspondence, the Germans referred to gas chambers as ‘baths for special purpose,’ Letter No. 12115/42/Er/Ha of 21 August 1942.”

This propaganda dogma was precisely the basis of the interrogation in question, which began with this question:

“What was the camouflage term for gas chambers on the drawings and documents in the correspondence between the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp and your company?”

Of course, Prüfer hastened to reply in accordance with the Soviet propaganda script that the terms used were “morgues,” “special basements” and, indeed, “bathing establishments for special operations.” The last two terms, however, referred to anything else but homicidal gas chambers.¹²⁴ As for the first term, after Pressac’s books have been published, no serious historian claims anymore that “morgue” was a cryptonym.

Prüfer mendaciously and inexplicably equated the “bathing establishments for special operations” with the legendary gassing “bunkers” presumably located just outside the Birkenau Camp. I say mendaciously, because these “bunkers” never existed,¹²⁵ and inexplicably, because as early as 14 August 1942, the Auschwitz Central Construction Office had prepared a drawing of Crematoria IV and V that contained an eight-muffle Topf furnace.¹²⁶ But if that is so, then how could Prüfer have proposed to allocate two eight-muffle furnaces from the Mogilev order to the “bathing establishments for special operations,” if these were identical with the alleged “bunkers”?

It is a fact, however, that he knew nothing about these imaginary installations – which is impossible, if they had actually existed, due to the function Prüfer performed at Auschwitz. He was even unaware of the term “bunkers.” This is explained by the fact that, in all the records of the Soviet Commission of Inquiry into Auschwitz, what were later called “bunkers,” are always referred to simply as “gas chambers.” What little Prüfer reported in the course of his interrogation, he claims to have learned not from the head of the Central Construction Office or some member of it, but from an inmate of the Main Camp, of all people!

¹²⁵ See Mattogno 2016a for details.

¹²⁶ Plan 1678(p)(r), reproduced in Pressac 1989, pp. 392-395.

On the other hand, if Prüfer knew nothing about the “bunkers,” hence the presumed “bathing establishments for special operations,” if he knew neither their structure nor their alleged extermination capacity, how could he propose to install at them the furnaces intended for Mogilev?

Prüfer’s statement also contains an anachronism. He asserted that on 19 August 1942, the corpses of the alleged victims of the “bunkers” “were cremated on pyres,”¹²⁷ but if we follow Czech’s Auschwitz Chronicle, outdoor cremation started only on 21 September 1942 (Czech 1990, p. 242).

Furthermore, the location of these “gas chambers” – Prüfer did not even know that they were supposed to have been two separate installations – “three kilometers away from the Birkenau crematoria,” echoed the respective mythology of the immediate postwar period. It was perhaps a misunderstood reference to a statement by former Auschwitz inmate Szlama Dragon, who had stated in the deposition he gave to Soviet investigators on 26 February 1945 that the “Gas Chambers [= Bunkers] No. 1 and No. 2 were about 3 kilometers apart” (Mattoigno 2022, p. 53). This sentence was also quoted in the Soviet report on Auschwitz, which appeared in Pravda on 7 May 1945, and later became Nuremberg Document USSR-008.¹²⁸ This document in turn constituted one of the Soviet investigators’ most important pieces of “evidence” against the Topf engineers.

From the orthodox point of view, the “bunkers”/presumed “bathing establishments for special operations” were directly related to the alleged mass extermination. If that is so, then Prüfer must have known about them as early as August 1942. However, he stated the following about this:¹²⁹

“During my visit to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in 1943, I became aware that a mass extermination of prisoners was taking place in this camp, including women, children and old people who had been sent to Auschwitz by the Hitlerites in whole transports from the European countries occupied by Germany. The prisoners who arrived at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were sent by the SS to the gas chambers, where they were murdered, and then their bodies were burned in the crematoria and on special pyres.”

The “visit” in question is that of 24 and 25 March 1943. If Prüfer learned of the alleged mass extermination only in March 1943, he cannot have been aware of it in August 1942. If that is so, then the “bathing establishments for special operations” cannot have had any connection to the alleged extermination, also because he, by virtue of his initial proposal to install two triple-muffle furnaces at them, could not have been unaware of the true purpose of these installations.

¹²⁷ The statement was made in the context of the discussion regarding the file memo of 21 August 1942. There is nothing to indicate that the alleged information from the inmate dates from a later time.

¹²⁸ IMT, Vol. 39, p. 245: “At first, the Germans had two gas chambers three kilometers apart.” This is based on the testimonies of Shyloma (recte: Szlama) Dragon.

¹²⁹ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 11 February 1948.

However, contradicting himself, Prüfer also stated that he knew “from the beginning of 1942 that the crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Camp were intended and used by the SS men for the mass extermination of prisoners.”¹³⁰ This contradicts his alleged observation of about ten corpses in the “gas chamber” of the crematorium of the Main Camp. In fact, nothing in his account suggests that a “mass extermination of prisoners” was taking place at Auschwitz. It is also not credible that Prüfer had learned directly from Bischoff “that prisoners were murdered in these gas chambers with hydrogen-cyanide vapors” only on the occasion of an order for gas testers,¹³¹ meaning in February 1943, and not already in August 1942, when he proposed to install the two simplified triple-muffle furnaces at the “bathing establishments for special operations.” If these facilities had really been the “bunkers” at Birkenau, Bischoff, and not a mere inmate (!), would have informed the Topf engineer of this at that point at the latest.

Contradicting himself even more, Prüfer asserted that he had learned that “innocent people were being exterminated and burned in the concentration camps” only “in the spring of 1943, when the bodies of people murdered in the gas chamber of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were cremated in my presence during the testing of the furnaces in the crematorium,”¹³² meaning during his visit to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March 1943, while Bischoff had already requested the gas testers from him the month before, explaining that, “after the poisoning of prisoners in the gas chambers, there were often cases where hydrogen-cyanide vapors remained in them even after they had been ventilated, which led to the poisoning of the operating personnel working in these chambers” (see Chapter 8.4.).

To recap, Prüfer claimed contradictorily that he first learned of “gas chambers” and mass exterminations at Auschwitz on four occasions:

1. in October-November 1941 (“gas chamber” of the Main Camp’s crematorium)
2. on 19 August 1942 (“bathing establishments for special operations”)
3. in February 1943 (order of gas testers)
4. on 24 and 25 March 1943 (test run of Crematorium II).

These glaring contradictions show that Prüfer did not report real experiences, but had fully adopted the Soviet's propaganda, with which he was evidently only fragmentarily familiar.

7.3. The “Gas Chamber” of Crematorium II in March 1943

In Prüfer's first interrogation, he stated with reference to his visit to Auschwitz in the company of Schultze “in the spring of 1943”:¹³³

“I personally saw an SS woman with dogs herding female prisoners into the barracks. I also saw Jews digging up earth with their hands under SS guard, and carrying it from one place to another. When I was in the crematorium, at about 10 o'clock in the morning, I saw for myself that there were up to 60 corpses of men and women of various ages lying on the ground, ready to be cremated in the crematorium. Six bodies were cremated in my presence, and I came to the conclusion that the furnaces were working well.”

During the interrogation on 19 March 1946, Captain Morskoi returned to the issue:¹³⁴

“Question: Were the crematoria tested during your presence in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?”

Answer: Of the six times I visited the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, only once, at the beginning of 1943, was a test carried out in my presence on two of the five furnaces I had set up in the newly built crematorium. Six corpses of men of different ages were cremated in all [both furnaces], and there in the crematorium were also corpses of women and children who had been murdered in the gas chambers, and who were to be cremated in the crematorium. The total number of corpses was about sixty.

Question: How did you participate in the cremation of the bodies of murdered, innocent people?”

Answer: I checked whether the furnaces I had installed in the crematorium were working.

Question: What conclusion did you draw?”

Answer: I concluded that the furnaces I built in the crematorium worked well and without any problems.”

As quoted earlier, Prüfer added later during the same interrogation:

“Question: When did you find out that innocent people were being exterminated and burned in the concentration camps?”

Answer: I learned about this in the spring of 1943, when the bodies of people murdered in the gas chamber of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp

¹³³ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 5 March 1946.

¹³⁴ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 19 March 1946 were cremated in my presence during the testing of the furnaces in the crematorium.”

The reference to the “testing of the furnaces” needs to be clarified: Prüfer was not referring to the testing of Crematorium II’s cremation furnaces before the plant went into operation, but to a later event, which he recounted in the 9 March 1948 interrogation as follows:¹³⁵

“I did not have to take part in the testing of the cremation furnaces, or the commissioning of the crematoria built under my leadership in Auschwitz. This was done by fitters from the company who carried out the construction and assembly work in these crematoria under my supervision. During the trips to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I personally observed and checked the functioning of the cremation furnaces at a time when they were already in operation. At the time of these trips, the bodies of prisoners who had been murdered by the SS men in the gas chambers were cremated in my presence.

Once, probably in the spring of 1943, I went to Auschwitz at the invitation of the SS Construction Office to find out why the blowers near the furnaces^[136] of the 2nd crematorium were not working. Chief Engineer Schultze also went there to carry out the necessary repairs to these blowers and put them back into operation. Schultze did not succeed in repairing these blowers, and we were forced to dismantle them. But when we, meaning myself and Schultze, checked the functioning of the cremation furnaces without these blowers, around 25 bodies of inmates who, as Schultze told me, had been poisoned in the gas chamber, were cremated in our presence.”

Schultze provided the following account of this incident:¹³⁷

“When I was in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I personally saw SS men from the camp herding up to three hundred people in front of me – men, women and children; I could hardly tell what nationality they were, but judging by outward appearances they had no idea where they were being led. They were all herded into a large wooden barracks without windows, which was electrically lit on the inside. From the outside, this barracks was connected to the gas chamber by a closed corridor, where I installed the ventilation. I observed this at about 4 pm. The following day at ten o’clock in the morning, I was in the crematorium, and saw sixty corpses of men, women and children of various ages. They were lying undressed on the floor, ready to be put into the cremation furnace. Judging by their appearance, they had been murdered in the gas chamber.

Question: Tell us about the interior of the gas chamber!

¹³⁷ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Schultze dated 4 March 1946

Answer: This building^[138] was eight meters wide and thirteen meters long. It was completely empty inside. The height of the building inside was 2.6 meters. There were four square openings measuring 25 x 25 cm in the ceiling. The ventilation system exchanged air ten times [per hour], and was used to suck out the gas that had accumulated, and pump in fresh air. The ventilation pipes, which I personally designed for the gas chamber, were bricked into the walls of the chamber.

Question: Who did you talk to about the fact that the crematoria and gas chambers you designed and built were used to exterminate completely innocent people?

Answer: I want to make this clear. The designer of the cremation furnaces, Prüfer, was on a business trip to Auschwitz. When he arrived in the morning, he also saw the sixty corpses of men, women and children lying on the ground. I told him everything that had happened: how these people had been brought in, chased into the gas chambers [plural] and killed, and how their bodies were now being burned in the crematorium. Prüfer didn't respond to me on this."

A little later, Schultze stated during that same interrogation:

"Answer: I stayed there for five days, because there was no transport with people destined for extermination, but I had to test the function of the cremation furnace in practice. I was only able to carry out this test when the aforementioned up to three hundred people arrived, who were then murdered in the gas chambers [plural]."

During the interrogation of 14 March 1946, Schultze repeated this:¹³⁹

"The first time I went to Auschwitz in order to correct the mistakes made when calculating the ventilation for the crematoria. The second time I went two months later to start up the ventilation in a newly built crematorium. When I was in the concentration camp mentioned above, I personally observed how the SS men herded up to 300 people – men, women and children – not far from me, who apparently had no idea where they were being led. I also saw that all these people were being chased into a wooden barracks that had no windows. This barracks was connected by a closed corridor to the gas chamber in which I had installed the ventilation system. The group of people mentioned was chased into the wooden barracks at about 4 pm. I didn't know what was done with them, but the following day, at about 10 am, when I was in the crematorium, I saw sixty corpses of men, women and children of various ages lying naked on the floor. They were all dead, and had been taken to the crematorium to be incinerated. It gave the appearance^[140] as if all sixty people lying in the crematorium had been murdered in the gas chamber.”

¹³⁸ More precisely a semi-underground room.

¹³⁹ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Schultze dated 14 March 1946.

He then explained the reason for his visit to Auschwitz as follows:

“Because there were no people to be exterminated when I arrived at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I was unable to test the functioning of the ventilation system and the [furnaces of the] crematoria, and I had to spend six days there until a transport of people of different nationalities and ages was brought in. As I said before, I carried out the practical test of the crematorium’s functioning after sixty people had been murdered in the gas chamber and then burned in the crematorium with my participation. Then, after I had established that the ventilation system in the crematorium was working properly, I left the concentration camp.”

Schultze then specified that he had to wait for the arrival of a transport of people destined for extermination “so that I could test the functioning of the crematorium and the ventilation system during the incineration of the corpses of the innocent people previously murdered in the gas chambers. [plural].”

The facts provided by the two engineers make it possible to establish with certainty that their statements referred to their visit on 24 and 25 March 1943. However, Schultze also confused this with the alleged events relating to his visit on 1 March 1943. In his interrogation on 11 March 1948, he explained:

“After I had arrived in Auschwitz in March 1943 – I no longer remember the exact date; however, I know it was a Monday – I learned that the installation work on the ventilation equipment in the gas chamber of the second crematorium would be completed in one or two days; it was not until Wednesday that I was able to check it, and was convinced that it was working flawlessly. Likewise, I carried out the testing of the blower. However, the head of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp who was there, von Bischoff, stated that the blower had to be checked when cremating corpses in the furnaces, that is, at the time when the maximum temperature was reached in these furnaces. At that time the furnaces in the second crematorium were still being dried before their use, and no corpses had yet been cremated there. Under such circumstances, von Bischoff suggested that I wait until a prisoner transport arrived at the camp; then, he said, we could carry out the check and put the blower into operation.

The transport in question arrived at the camp on Saturday, and on the same day I checked with von Bischoff the operation, more precisely the operation during the activity, of both the blower and the ventilation systems in the gas chamber. On that occasion, about 150-300 inmates from the newly arrived transport were pushed by the SS into the gas chamber and poisoned with gas, then their corpses were cremated in the cremation furnaces. In this group of inmates who were killed in the gas chamber were men, women and children. At the time when the SS pushed them into the gas chamber, I was in the crematorium building, next to the cremation furnaces. The corpses of these inmates were cremated in my presence. After the killing of this group of inmates in the gas chamber had been carried out (which lasted no more than 50 minutes), an SS man in my presence turned on the ventilation systems, thanks to which the poisoned air was expelled from the gas chamber, and fresh air was introduced into it. Since it turned out in this test that the blower and ventilation facilities worked well, they were put into operation the same day by the SS Construction Office, that is, that Saturday I returned from Auschwitz to Erfurt. The blower and ventilation systems that had been installed at the furnaces and in the gas chamber of Crematorium III were tested by the SS Central Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp and put into operation in my absence.

Question: We show you a photocopy of a letter from the company 'Topf and Sons' to the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp dated 24 February 1943, in which you are informed that you would be arriving at the camp on 1 March 1943, to put into operation the aeration and de-aeration system of Crematorium II. Tell us what facilities were involved in this letter.

Answer: The above letter referred to putting into operation the ventilation devices that had been installed under my direction in the gas chamber of this crematorium, as I mentioned earlier. To what I have already stated, I want to add that at that time, in addition to carrying out the blower testing at the cremation furnaces, I also checked the ventilation systems that had been installed under my direction in the furnace room and in the corpse autopsy room."

The 1st of March 1943 was precisely a Monday. After all, the document in question, Topf's letter to the Auschwitz Central Construction Office dated 24 February 1943, announced:¹⁴¹

"We would like to take this opportunity to inform you that our Chief Engineer Schultze will be arriving there next Monday, 1 March, to put the ventilation system of Crematorium II PoW Camp into operation."

On the following Wednesday, thus the 3rd of March, Schultze tested "the ventilation systems in the gas chamber" and was convinced that they were "working flawlessly." Schultze then also tested the "blower," but Bischoff told him that it "had to be checked when cremating corpses in the furnaces," which, at that time, "were still being dried before their use, and no corpses had yet been cremated there.” The following Saturday, 6 March,¹⁴² a transport of inmates arrived, and Schultze and Bischoff were able to check together “the operation the operation during the activity, of both the blower and the ventilation systems in the gas chamber.” About 150-300 inmates from this transport were then killed in the “gas chamber” of Crematorium II. After about 50 minutes, the ventilation system was put into operation, and the corpses were cremated in the furnaces.

In this account, it must first be made clear that “the ventilation systems in the gas chamber” consisted of the aeration and de-aeration system of Morgue 1, while the term “blower” refers to the three forced-draft devices.

Schultze would therefore have tested the aeration and de-aeration system with the allegedly empty gas chamber on 3 March 1943. This is in contrast to the working-hour sheets of installer Messing, who wrote on 13 March 1943, “Aeration and de-aeration system [morgue] basement I put into operation.”¹⁴³ It may be that Messing, as Braun stated in the interrogation of 26 February 1948, had performed “the assembly work under the direct guidance of Chief Engineer K. Schulze,” but the fact remains that the test took place on 13 March, hence not on the 3rd. According to the Auschwitz Chronicle, a transport with 2,000 Jews from the Krakow Ghetto arrived in Auschwitz on 13 March 1943, of whom 1,492 were allegedly gassed in Morgue 1 of Crematorium II (Czech 1990, p. 352).

A clarification is due here. As the then senior researcher at the Auschwitz Museum Dr. Andrzej Strzelecki informed me, the transport from Krakow actually arrived in Auschwitz on 14 March, as is attested by the arrest forms of these Jews: “Arrested on 14 March 1943 – where: Kraków /Interned /at Auschwitz Camp – note AS/ on 14 March 1943. Admitting authority: RSHA.”¹⁴⁴

Therefore, the transport arrived on 14 March, not on the 6th, and there were allegedly 1,492 gassing victims, not 150-300.

On 24 and 25 March 1943, Schultze and Prüfer were in Auschwitz together. On 25 March 1943, SS Untersturmführer Hans Kirschnek, head of construction of the Auschwitz Camp und Agriculture Auschwitz, wrote a file memo that had as its subject, precisely, Prüfer’s and Schultze’s visit to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March. It referred to the “telegraphic request to come here in order to repair of defects in Crematorium II and III in PoW ¹⁴² During the interrogation of 4 March 1946, Schulze reported that he had been idle at Auschwitz for five days. During the interrogation of 14 March 1946, he definitely mentioned six days three times, so that the Saturday he mentioned could only be 6 March.

Camp¹⁴⁵ Auschwitz.” Crematorium II had in fact suffered a serious breakdown, about which the document reports the following:¹⁴⁶

“As the three forced-draft devices did not perform well at all, and even suffered damage after the first full use due to excessive temperatures, they were removed at the expense of Topf & Sons, and returned by this company.”

Therefore, Schultze was to check the condition of the three forced-draft devices in Crematorium II, while Prüfer was to check the efficient operation of the five triple-muffle cremation furnaces without such devices, which is why the two engineers spoke of “testing” the cremation furnaces and the “blowers.”

The three forced-draft devices initially installed in Birkenau Crematorium II consisted of three large No. 625 blowers housed in a drum-shaped metal housing, i.e., they had pressure ducts 62.5 cm in diameter, and each weighed 775 kg.¹⁴⁷ They were housed in three service rooms arranged around the chimney, and each device was connected to one of the three chimney flues by means of a dedicated opening.¹⁴⁸

At the beginning of the second decade of March 1943, serious inconveniences occurred in Crematorium II. This was due to the concurrence of two causes. On the one hand, the forced-draft devices were operated at full capacity, which, partly due to a design error in the triple-muffle furnace,¹⁴⁹ caused such an increase in the velocity of the fumes that the combustible gases that developed from the corpses placed in the central muffles and the as-yet unburned gases from the two side muffles exited the furnaces partly unburned, and the final combustion process took place essentially in the smoke ducts. This resulted in high temperatures in these ducts, which caused part of the ducts’ and the chimney flues’ refractory masonry to collapse. On the other hand, the high-temperature fumes from the muffles, passing through the forced-draft devices, caused their engines to overheat and suffer irreparable damage.

Since the two engineers went urgently to Auschwitz on 24 March as a result of the above-mentioned “telegraphic request,” it is clear that the breakdown had been discovered a few days earlier, and that the crematorium had, as a precaution, suspended its operations.

¹⁴⁹ Ibid., Part I, Section II, Chapter 10.10., pp. 379-382.

In this context, once it had been ascertained that the forced-draft devices were inoperable, checking the operation of the furnaces without such devices was perfectly logical. Even the number of corpses to be cremated for the verification – 60 – seems understandable: four consecutive cremations were to be carried out in each muffle ($3 \times 5 \times 4 = 60$). On the other hand, the reference to the alleged gas chamber is completely incomprehensible in this context.

Schultze's claim is completely false that he remained in Auschwitz for 5 or 6 days waiting for a transport of victims destined for the gas chamber whose corpses were to be used for testing the furnaces.

First of all, Schultze remained in Auschwitz for only two days, 24 and 25 March, and it could not have been otherwise, because his task, as Prüfer rightly stated, "consisted of him carrying out an inspection of the ventilation equipment¹⁵⁰ [forced-draft devices] in the crematorium."¹⁵¹ This means that on these two days he inspected the forced-draft devices, and ascertained that they were inoperable, as is evident from the file memo mentioned earlier. With that, his task was over: there was no reason for him to remain in Auschwitz any longer to check the operation of the furnaces without the forced-draft blowers, a task that fell to his colleague Prüfer.

On 16 April 1943, Topf declared that they were prepared to take back the three damaged devices, crediting the Central Construction Office with RM 3,705 as reimbursement;¹⁵² they were dismantled by Topf's installer Messing between 17 and 19 May.¹⁵³

Second, according to Danuta Czech's Auschwitz Chronicle, one transport with 2,800 and another with 1,901 Jews from Greece arrived at Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March, respectively. Of these deportees, 1,986 and 1,206, respectively, were allegedly gassed (Czech 1990, pp. 359f.).

¹⁵³ Topf, Arbeitszeit-Bescheinigung for Messing, 17-19 May 1943: "Im Krematorium II (Bauwerk 30) die 3 Stück Saugzuganlagen abmontiert." APMO, BW 30/31, D-ZBau/2540, p. 91.

However, the two Topf engineers knew absolutely nothing of these purported gassings. So, from the point of view of the orthodox Holocaust narrative, there should have been an abundance of corpses for testing. Hence, there would have been no need to gas an additional 300 inmates.

Third, at least 5,500 inmates died in Auschwitz in March 1943,¹⁵⁴ averaging nearly 180 per day, so even if there weren't any gassings at all, there was no shortage of actual corpses.

Prüfer's and Schultze's account is thus woven into the blatantly propagandistic claim that in Auschwitz, in order to obtain corpses that can be disposed of, one necessarily had to kill people in the "gas chambers," as if there had not been a very high "natural" mortality rate.

Schultze's statements are moreover contradictory and nonsensical. He claims that 300 people were gassed for testing the operation of the furnaces in Crematorium II, but there were 60 corpses brought into the furnace room for testing, of which, according to Prüfer, only six were cremated in his presence (and thus used for testing). But then, what was the need to gas 300 people? Moreover, since 294 corpses still remained available after the test, for what reason would Schultze have to wait several days for the arrival of a transport destined for the alleged gas chamber? And this to perform a task that was not his responsibility, and that had already been performed by Kurt Prüfer!

Finally, a profound contradiction in Schultze's statements should be noted. He claimed on the one hand that he had immediately carried out "the practical test of the crematorium's functioning after sixty people had been murdered in the gas chamber and then burned in the crematorium." On the other hand, he "was only able to carry out this test when the aforementioned up to three hundred people arrived, who were then murdered in the gas chambers" after five or six days of waiting in Auschwitz.

In fact, 15 corpses, three for each of the five triple-muffle furnaces, would have been sufficient to test the efficiency of the three forced-draft devices.

It is therefore clear that Schultze attributed to the visit on 24 and 25 March his alleged experiences of the 1-March visit, although that one turns out to be just as false, as noted earlier.

¹⁵⁴ See Mattogno 2023a, pp. 191f. Between the 1st and 23rd of February 1943, 4,492 deaths are documented; the missing Death Book No. 12/43, which contained 1,500 death records (consecutive numbers 16501-18000), covered the period 23 March to 4 April. For the first four days of April, about 500 deaths can be estimated, so in March 1943 there were about 5,500 fatalities.

This confusion shines through clearly in the following statements made by Schultze on 11 March 1948:

“We visited the aforementioned camp at the request of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp to find out why the blower at the cremation furnaces of the second crematorium was not working. We found that the deformation of the blower blades of the blower fan, and consequently also the failure of the blower, had occurred, because a very high, certainly continuous temperature had been maintained in the furnaces of the crematorium all the time. After we arrived at the site, we agreed with the head of the Construction Office, von Bischoff, that we would disassemble this blower, because we did not consider it advisable to repair it. When Prüfer and I were at the crematorium, there on the floor next to the crematoria lay about 60 bodies of inmates, who, I suspect, had been killed in the gas chamber. Then, the corpses of about 25 of these inmates were cremated in our presence. After this fact, I no longer went to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.”

This refers to the visit on 24 and 25 March 1943, but during the interrogation of 14 March 1946, Schultze asserted:

“Answer: When the sixty corpses were brought into the crematorium for incineration, I was giving instructions to the fitters of the ventilation equipment on how to put it into operation, because it was a crematorium that had just been completed.

Question: So you were directly involved in testing the function of the crematorium and the ventilation equipment you installed in the crematorium?

Answer: Yes, the newly built crematorium and the ventilation equipment I installed for the crematorium were tested with my direct involvement. At that time, all sixty corpses lying there were cremated.”

These statements pertain to the 1-March visit, but there appear mixed in the sixty corpses of the alleged gassings from the cremation test on 24 and 25 March.

In this regard, Prüfer’s statement regarding the cremation of six corpses in two furnaces is perfectly logical. The furnace room of Crematorium II was equipped with six smoke ducts, one for each furnace, the sixth for the waste incinerator. Each pair of ducts merged into a single common duct that entered into one of the three chimney flues of identical size (80 cm × 120 cm), into which the chimney was divided. Each of these three flues was connected by a short vertical branch to a forced-draft device. Therefore, to check the draft when the furnaces operated without a forced-draft device, it was sufficient to use one of the two pairs of furnaces whose fumes flowed into the same duct and thus into the same chimney flue. This is the reason why Prüfer limited himself to having the cremation of six corpses performed in two furnaces, thus one corpse per muffle. On the basis of this experiment, Prüfer came to the conclusion that the furnaces “worked well and without any problems.”

The cremation of 25 corpses stated by Prüfer during the interrogation of 9 March 1948 (and by Schultze on 11 March 1948), on the other hand, has no logical reason.

Thus, the story of the gassing of up to 300 people, and the waiting for these deportees to arrive, so their bodies could be used to test the crematorium’s incineration equipment, has neither any historical nor technical basis for either the visit on 1 March or that on 24-25 March 1943.

7.4. Explanatory Note on the Draft of Cremation Furnaces

The chimney draft of the crematoria was measured in mm of water column (German: Wassersäule, abbreviated as WS). 1 mm of water column is equivalent to the pressure of 1 kg per m². The minimum value was 10 mm WS, the maximum value 30 mm WS.

The strength of the draft, by drawing combustion air through the grate of the gas-generator, also determined the grate regime of the hearth, i.e., the amount of coke burned on 1 m² of grate surface in one hour. With natural draft (10 mm WS), the grate regime was usually 120 kg of coke per m² and hour, with forced draft (30 mm WS) it was up to 180 kg (Mattogno/Deana, Part I, p. 355). The grate regime could be reduced by closing the hearth’s air door, but only slightly, because too much reduction would have resulted in a lowering of the chimney draft, and thus smoke formation and cooling of the muffles and, at the limit, shutdown of the hearth.

The value of the draft force is a function of the chimney’s height and the temperature difference between outside and flue-gas temperature, according to the following equation:

where E is the draft value, h_c the chimney height, t_a the outside air temperature, and t_f the average flue-gas temperature.

The four gas-heated Volckmann-Ludwig furnaces installed in 1932 by the H.R. Heinicke Company in the Hamburg-Ohlsdorf Crematorium operated with average temperatures of 800-900°C. The smoke temperature, measured behind the smoke damper, was normally about 100°C lower (Manskopf, p. 775). Since these furnaces had no recuperator, the smoke gases were similar to that of the Topf furnaces in Auschwitz-Birkenau, which had an operating temperature of 800°C. However, since the smoke ducts, with a cross section of 0.42 m² (0.6 m × 0.7 m), were very long (the shortest ones, those of the third and fourth furnaces, measured about 6.5 m and 10.5 m), the temperature at the base of the chimney was undoubtedly lower than 700°C, but certainly higher than 500°C, because the chimney had a 12 cm thick refractory lining up to a height of six meters,¹⁵⁵ and this was done when the temperature of the smoke exceeded 500°C (Beutinger, p. 146; Colombo, p. 400).

Since the chimney height was 15.46 m ($h_c = 15.46$ m), and if assuming an outside temperature of 10°C ($t_a = 10^\circ\text{C}$) and a flue-gas temperature of 500°C ($t_f = 500^\circ\text{C}$), the draft pressure difference was about 12 mm WS, sufficient for normal operation of the plant. This derives also from the fact that the furnaces of all four crematoria at Birkenau regularly carried out their operations without forced-draft devices. This fact is confirmed by an undated questionnaire on the Birkenau crematoria compiled by Bischoff in June 1943.¹⁵⁶

The three forced-draft devices planned for Crematorium III were in fact never installed, as Kirschnek reported in his aforementioned file memo dated 25 March 1943:

“Based on experience at Crematorium II, the planned and delivered forced-draft devices will not be installed, but are taken over by the Central Construction Office for storage.”

For Crematoria IV and V, however, such installations were not provided at all. Their chimneys, 16.87 m high, provided a draft of about 13 mm WS. It should be noted that the cross section of the flues was proportionally identical to that of the chimneys of Crematoria II and III. These each had a chimney with three flues, each with a cross section of $0.8\text{ m} \times 1.2\text{ m} = 0.96\text{ m}^2$ serving two furnaces (six muffles). Crematoria IV and V each had two chimneys of each $0.8\text{ m} \times 0.8\text{ m} = 0.64\text{ m}^2$ cross section, serving four muffles, so that in both cases a cross section of 0.16 m^2 per muffle was calculated.

8. The “Gas Chamber” of Crematorium II

8.1. Location

Asked about the existence of gas chambers “near the crematoria,” Prüfer replied:¹⁵⁷

“Yes, I saw a gas chamber outside, because there was a wooden barracks, from it there was a connection to the gas chamber; from the gas chamber, there was a connection to the crematorium.”

Schultze reported in this regard:¹⁵⁸

“[The victims] were all herded into a large wooden barracks without windows, which was electrically lit on the inside. From the outside, this barracks was connected to the gas chamber by a closed corridor, where I installed the ventilation.”

Prüfer placed the “gas chamber” outside the crematorium, which shows that he did not even know at that time that the alleged gas chamber was supposed to be the crematorium’s Morgue #1. Both interviewees mentioned a “wooden barracks,” which Schultze said was connected to the crematorium. This is an unequivocal reference to the story of the barracks presumably used as an undressing facility for the victims of the alleged gas chamber as told by witness Henryk Tauber in his interrogation by Soviet investigators on 24 May 1945. I have documented the unfounded nature of this claim elsewhere.¹⁵⁹

However, it should be pointed out that Tauber did not mention the alleged “closed corridor” that allegedly connected this barracks to the crematorium. Schultze’s statement that “this barracks was connected to the gas chamber by a closed corridor” does not even make sense, because the alleged “gas chamber,” meaning Morgue #1, was only one of the rooms in the basement of Crematorium II. Therefore, if the barracks had been connected to anything, it would have been an entrance to the building’s basement, not the gas chamber. This is explicitly admitted by Annegret Schüle, who states (Schüle, Note 126, p. 272):

“Structural statements such as Schultze’s and Prüfer’s claim that a wooden barracks was connected to the gas chamber by a closed corridor are also incorrect.”

8.2. Terms: the “Code Language”

On the terms used for the alleged homicidal gas chamber, Schultze stated:¹⁶⁰

“On the orders of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I installed ventilation equipment in the so-called ‘shower baths’ in these camps [plural] in 1942-1943. In reality, this ventilation was constructed and installed by me in the gas chambers.”

As shown earlier, when addressing the same topic and in response to a specific question about the “code language” used for the alleged homicidal gas chambers, Prüfer used the terms “morgues,” “special basements” and “bathing establishments for special operations.”

As for the “shower baths,” Schultze had probably learned from Soviet investigators that the “gas chamber” at Crematorium II, according to what Henryk Tauber had reported in his Soviet deposition, was to be “disguised” as a shower room.¹⁶¹

“There were installations there like in shower rooms, i.e., there were shower heads overhead.”

But perhaps Schultze was aware of the Central Construction Office’s plan for “bath facilities” in Crematoria II and III by exploiting the heat from the smoke of the cremation furnaces (Mattogno 2019, pp. 135-140).

Therefore, Prüfer and Schultze did nothing more than adopt the fictitious terms that had been suggested to them by the Soviet investigators.

It is worth clarifying that Pressac’s pertinent “criminal trace,” the one precisely concerning the presence of 14 “showers” in Morgue #1, is documented in the handover deliberations of Crematorium III to the Central Construction office of 24 June 1943,¹⁶² but not in that of Crematorium II of 31 March 1943.¹⁶³ I explained the actual history of these showers in another study (Mattogno 2019, pp. 134-142).

Here, however, I may call attention to another oddity. The deliberations to hand over Crematorium III presupposed, like that of Crematorium II, the testing of the cremation furnaces and ventilation systems, but it does not appear that Prüfer and Schultze were in Auschwitz on that occasion. If that is so, then by whom were the tests carried out? The most likely explanation ¹⁶⁰ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Schultze dated 4 March 1946.

¹⁶¹ Deposition by H. Tauber dated 27-28 February 1945 before the Soviet Commission of Inquiry; GARF, 7021-108-8, p. 31; Mattogno 2022, p. 19.

is that here, too, the documentation created by the Central Construction Office was purged by the Soviets.¹⁶⁴

8.3. Equipment

Schultze was accused by Soviet investigators of having built the air intake and extraction system for the “gas chambers” of Crematoria II and III. This accusation makes sense only in the context of the now historically untenable thesis that Crematoria II and III at Birkenau were designed and built for homicidal purposes from the very beginning. As is well known, from Pressac to van Pelt, the orthodoxy has abandoned this thesis, claiming instead that the two aforementioned crematoria were designed as ordinary sanitation facilities. Only from late 1942 onward are they said to have been gradually transformed into instruments of mass murder.¹⁶⁵ However, such a conjecture has no basis in fact.

In the “Cost Estimate for Air Intake and Extraction Systems” of the future Crematorium II drawn up by Topf on 4 November 1941, two blowers (one for air intake, the other for air extraction) were planned for the ventilation of the “B’-Raum” (= “belüfteter Raum,” ventilated room), meaning Morgue #1.¹⁶⁶ Each had an hourly flow rate of 4,800 m³ of air against a total pressure of 40 mm water column. They were driven by a 3-phase motor of 2 horsepowers. The total cost of the system was RM 1,847.¹⁶⁷ The ventilation systems actually installed in Crematorium II are listed in Invoice No. 171 prepared by the Topf Company on 22 February 1943. According to this invoice, the “Supply of ventilation and air intake and extraction systems as they were described in detail in our cost estimate of 4 Nov. 1941” consisted exactly of the blowers and engines as listed in this cost estimate.¹⁶⁸

Therefore, the capacity of the system actually installed in Morgue #1 of Crematorium II was exactly the same as had been designed many months before the alleged criminal transformation of the crematorium. It had been designed by Schultze on 10 March 1942 (Drawing D 59366) according to the above-mentioned cost estimate.¹⁶⁹ This confirms that the ventilation system could not have had any criminal purpose. Later changes from the initial design did not touch the structure or capacity of the system. After the Topf Company had received the plans for the new crematorium, they had to modify the air intake and extraction ducts of the individual rooms, and drew up a new drawing (D 59394) showing the location of the respective blowers. Since the dimensions of Morgues #1 and #2 had changed, “different air-intake and -extraction openings” had to be designed. In addition, the sections of the walled ducts were modified:¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁵ According to van Pelt, as he communicated to A. Schüle, this transformation supposedly started in September 1942, while Pressac insists on November 1942; Schüle, p. 180.

“You want to provide an extraction duct with a clear width of 600 x 500 mm for Morgue #1, and an extraction duct of 800 x 500 mm for Morgue #2.”

Schultze was thus only the designer of a normal ventilation system for a morgue, which was installed by fitter Heinrich Messing in both Crematorium II and Crematorium III. Contradicting this, Schultze made the following revealing “confession” in this regard:¹⁷¹

“This building was eight meters wide and thirteen meters long. It was completely empty inside. The height of the building inside was 2.6 meters. There were four square openings measuring 25 x 25 cm in the ceiling. The ventilation system exchanged air ten times [per hour], and was used to suck out the gas that had accumulated, and pump in fresh air. The ventilation pipes, which I personally designed for the gas chamber, were bricked into the walls of the chamber.”

The “building” [здание, zdanie] in question was Morgue #1, a semi-underground room measuring not 13 m × 80 m, but only 7 m × 30 m, and 2.41 m high.

As I have noted elsewhere,¹⁷² for Michał Kula, an essential witness in this regard, the four alleged square Zyklon-B-introduction openings in the roof of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II measured no less than 70 cm × 70 cm,¹⁷³ not 25 cm × 25 cm. On the other hand, neither Schultze nor Prüfer ever mentioned any wire-mesh columns allegedly used to introduce Zyklon ¹⁶⁹ See Topf Drawing D 59366 dated 10 March 1942, published by Jean-Claude Pressac (1993, Docs. 13-15). Schüle reproduces the entire project in color; Schüle, pp. 438f.

B, which, according to Pressac, were the four “wire-mesh introduction devices” mentioned in the documents on the handover deliberations of 31 March 1943 for Crematorium II. Indeed, in Schultze’s statement quoted already twice, he explicitly stated that Morgue #1 “was completely empty inside.” Although one could object that the alleged columns had not yet been installed on the 24th and 25th of March 1943, since they appear only in a document dated 31 March, the witness Henryk Tauber asserted that they were already present in the alleged homicidal gas chamber at the time of the first gassing, that is, as early as 14 March.¹⁷⁴

“Near the wire-mesh columns, they were less crowded. From the arrangement of the bodies, it could be seen that people had moved away from these columns and had wanted to reach the door.”

While this is undoubtedly significant, much more important is what Schultze stated about the capacity of the fans in the “gas chamber”: the system provided 10 air exchanges per hour, which was allegedly sufficient to remove the “gas” from the room, and to renew the air in it.

As I noted as early as 1993, the study of the ventilation systems of Crematoria II and III provides conclusive proof that Morgue #1 was never turned into a homicidal gas chamber. In fact, for Morgue #1, the alleged homicidal gas chamber, 9.5 (= about 10, according to Schultze’s statement) air exchanges per hour were provided, while Morgue #2, allegedly the victim’s undressing room, 11 air exchanges per hour were provided. It follows that the alleged undressing room was ventilated better than the alleged homicidal gas chamber! (Mattogno 1994, pp. 59-62; 2016c, pp. 173-176). I also noted at the time that, according to engineer Wilhelm Heepke’s classic work on the design of crematoria, a minimum of five air exchanges per hour should be provided for morgues, but up to ten exchanges in the case of heavy use (see Chapter 11.4.). However, as many as 72 air exchanges per hour were provided for the Degesch standard hydrogen-cyanide disinfestation chambers (2016c, p. 175; 2019, pp. 45-47). It incontrovertibly follows from this that the ventilation system installed in Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III was that of a normal morgue.

It should also be noted that for the project “De-aeration system for the morgue cells and for the dissection room” dated 9 December 1940 concerning Crematorium I of the Auschwitz Main Camp, which I have already dealt with earlier, Schultze had made the following decision:¹⁷⁵

¹⁷⁵ Letter by Topf to SS New Construction Office Auschwitz dated 9 December 1940; RGVA, 502-1-312, p. 136.

“For the dissection room, we have provided for a 10-fold air exchange, and for the morgue a 20-fold air exchange. This air exchange rate ensures good ventilation of the rooms.”

Therefore, in December 1940, nine months before the alleged “first gas-sing” at Auschwitz, Schultze had deemed as many as 20 air exchanges per hour necessary for a very normal morgue. But then, at the beginning of 1943, he had a ventilation system installed that allowed for only 10 air exchanges per hour, yet allegedly served to ventilate a hydrogen-cyanide-operated homicidal gas chamber,!

The above therefore also renders the following statement by Schultze nonsensical:

“The ventilation pipes, which I personally designed for the gas chamber, were bricked into the walls of the chamber.” (Emphasis added)

In fact, these walled ducts already appear in Drawing 1173-1174 of the future Crematorium II, drawn by SS Unterscharführer Karl Ulmer on 15 January 1942 (Pressac 1989, pp. 272f.), several months before the alleged criminal transformation of the facility.

Schultze did not specify what his alleged design of the ventilation system “for the gas chamber” consisted of, and how it differed from a system designed for a normal morgue. In fact, there was no difference, because, as I have already explained, the ventilation system for the alleged homicidal gas chamber remained the same as that which had been designed for the morgue.

Therefore, Schultze could and should have defended himself effectively by asserting truthfully that he had designed a normal ventilation system for a morgue that the SS evidently had later misused for homicidal purposes. Yet like his colleagues Prüfer and Sander, he preferred instead to mendaciously accuse himself of having designed from the beginning a ventilation system specifically designed for a homicidal gas chamber.

8.4. The “Gas Testers”

During his interrogation on 4 March 1948, Prüfer was shown a photocopy of Topf’s famous letter of 2 March 1943 regarding “gas testers” (a term rendered as “газоизмерители,” gazoizmeriteli: gas meters). The Topf engineer commented on it as follows:¹⁷⁶

“At the request of the head of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp von Bischoff [sic], I searched for gas testers as mentioned in the photocopy of my letter to the aforementioned Construction Office dated 2 March 1943, in order to equip the gas chambers in the camp crematoria with them. When von Bischoff approached me with this request, he explained to me that, after the poisoning of prisoners in the gas chambers, there were often cases where hydrogen-cyanide vapors remained in them even after they had been ventilated, which led to the poisoning of the operating personnel working in these chambers. That is why von Bischoff asked me to find out which companies manufactured gas testers that could be used to measure the concentration of hydrogen-cyanide vapors in the gas chambers in order to make the work of the operating personnel safe. I was unable to fulfill von Bischoff's request, because I could not find any company that manufactured such gas testers."

Prüfer's explanations are completely wrong. The issue of "gas testers" has been dealt with extensively in other studies (Lüftl 2019, pp. 76-78; Matogno 2004; 2016c, pp. 80-82), which I briefly summarize.

In German technical terminology, a "gas tester" ("Gasprüfer") was a simple combustion-gas analyzer, a mechanical device that was installed in the smoke duct of a combustion plant to determine some of the main constituents of the combustion gas. By the early 1940s, there were various instruments for analyzing flue gases, from devices for analyzing flue gases (Rauchgasanalyse-Anlagen) to transmitters indicating the percentage of CO₂, to indicators giving the percentage of either CO₂ or CO and H₂ (Matogno 2016c, Doc. 12, p. 208). Civilian crematoria were also normally equipped with gas testers.¹⁷⁷ Prüfer knew this very well, so he spoke of "equipping" (Russian: оборудование oborudovanie) the alleged gas chamber with "gas testers," as if these were mechanical devices to be permanently installed somewhere.

What Prüfer did not know, however, was that the test for gas residues of hydrogen cyanide could be performed exclusively by a chemical method, namely by means of the "gas-residue detection devices for Zyklon [B]", a kit containing various chemicals that were used to freshly prepare a paper strip soaked in a solution sensitive to hydrogen cyanide, which turned blue in its presence. Therefore, no room could be "equipped" with such a kit.

It is moreover obvious that Bischoff would never have asked the Topf Company for a chemical kit that it neither manufactured nor traded (the "gas-residue detection devices for Zyklon [B]"), whereas the request for gas testers – combustion-gas analyzers – fell fully within Topf’s thermotechnical sphere of competence and activities, that is, the one concerning the production of combustion plants.

The chemical test kit was supplied by the firms that distributed Zyklon B, such as Tesch & Stabenow of Hamburg,¹⁷⁸ under whose commercial jurisdiction Auschwitz fell. Hence, these kits were very easy to obtain. Their vendor did not have to be searched for.

Hence, Prüfer lied while being well aware that he was lying, evidently to please the Soviet investigators.

The incomprehensible equating of gas testers in the aforementioned letter of 2 March 1943 as having also been called “indicator devices for hydrogen-cyanide residues” (“Anzeigegeräte für Blausäure-Reste”) – a term that was completely foreign to the technical literature of the time and is moreover contradictory¹⁷⁹ – is therefore clearly absurd, because it implied both a chemical procedure and a mechanical instrument, although it cannot have been both.

The motivation for Bischoff’s alleged request for “gas testers,” namely its necessity in the context of homicidal gassings, is not substantiated by any document. On the other hand, at least two cases of hydrogen-cyanide poisoning as a result of disinfestation gassings are known: one was mentioned by Rudolf Höss in the special order dated 12 August 1942;¹⁸⁰ the other occurred on 9 December 1943, when a civilian worker forced his way into a lodging barracks that had just been disinfested.¹⁸¹

In this affair, what is astonishing is not so much the claim of possible “gas-residue detection devices” for the alleged homicidal gas chamber, but precisely the fact that it was never used in any alleged homicidal gas chamber, either before or after, even though it was an essential kit for safeguarding the lives of detainee and SS personnel assigned to “gassings.” And all this, even though the use of this kit was mandatory in disinfestation chambers.¹⁸² In fact, not a single “eyewitness” ever mentioned a test for gas residues in the alleged homicidal gas chambers.

¹⁷⁸ A “gas-residue detection devices [for Zyklon B]” appears among the materials related to the use of Zyklon B (gas masks, filters, etc.) that were ordered on 25 July 1942 by the administration of Lublin PoW Camp from the Tesch Company. Letter from Tesch & Stabenow to the administration of Lublin PoW Camp dated 29 July 1942. APM, sygn. I d 2, vol. 1, p. 107. I published the document in Mattogno 2016c, p. 207.

¹⁷⁹ “Anzeigegeräte” were mechanical indicators, usually equipped with a pointer.

¹⁸¹ RGVA, 502-1-8, p. 25.

¹⁸² Mattogno 2004, “Auschwitz: ‘Gas Testers’ and Gas Residue Test Kits,” pp. 150-155.

The reason given by Prüfer, namely that Bischoff had revealed to him that poisoning cases had occurred “even after” the homicidal gas chambers had been ventilated, can only refer to the alleged “bunkers” at Birkenau, since the alleged homicidal gas chamber of Crematorium II had not yet become operational on 2 March 1943. However, for these bunker gas chambers, which had operated for many months, thus creating, according to van Pelt, “more than 200,000” victims (van Pelt 2002, p. 568), Bischoff had felt no need to procure “gas testers.” Instead, he had asked Prüfer to procure them for the alleged homicidal gas chamber of Crematorium II, precisely on the basis of Bischoff’s alleged experience with the homicidal gas chambers of the “bunkers”!

8.5. “Gas Chambers” and Morgue Chambers

In his effort to conform to the Soviet investigators’ thesis, Prüfer ran into other errors that betray the fictitious nature of his claims. One of these concerns the morgues of the crematoria. On this, Robert Jan van Pelt wrote emphatically:¹⁸³

“By the time the crematoria were finished, Auschwitz had virtually no permanently dedicated morgue capacity.”

This would make sense, if his thesis of the homicidal use of these rooms were true. As I have shown in another article, however, the morgues of the Birkenau crematoria continued to be used as such on a daily basis, even after their alleged transformation into gas chambers.

In contrast to the orthodox position on this, Prüfer made the following statement:¹⁸⁴

“In addition, special rooms were set up there [inside the crematoria] for the operating personnel recruited from among the prisoners, as well as medical cabinets, where the autopsies of the corpses took place, and morgue rooms, in which the corpses of those tortured to death in the gas chambers were piled up, because although the crematoria were in operation 24 hours a day, they were unable to burn them [the corpses].”

Right after this, he reiterated that “ventilation devices were also manufactured and installed in the gas chambers, the furnace rooms and the morgues.” Finally, after having mentioned that “ventilation devices were made to suck in and expel air in four [sic!¹⁸⁵] gas chambers at the second and third crematorium,” Prüfer let a true statement slip through when stating:¹⁸⁴

¹⁸⁴ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 4 March 1948.

“In addition, ventilation equipment and blowers were manufactured and installed in the morgues and in the furnace rooms of the first, second and third crematorium.”

Therefore, real morgues existed in Crematoria II and III, which were equipped with real ventilation systems. But if that was so, then how does this square with the thesis of homicidal gas chambers? When Crematoria II and III went into operation, they possessed only two basement rooms: Morgue #1 and Morgue #2. If the former was a homicidal gas chamber, then the latter cannot have been an undressing room (which Prüfer never mentioned), but had to be a real morgue.

Among the documents concerning the presence of real morgues in the Birkenau crematoria, one is particularly important because of its date. On 20 March 1943, the SS garrison physician of Auschwitz, SS Hauptsturmführer Eduard Wirths, wrote a letter to the camp commandant, in which he noted as part of a general plan to expand the Birkenau Camp’s inmate hospital:¹⁸⁶

“For the removal of the corpses from the detainee sick-bay to Crematorium 2, covered hand carts must be procured, allowing the transportation of 50 corpses each.”

Dr. Wirths was referring to Crematorium II in Birkenau. As mentioned earlier, about 5,500 inmates died in the Auschwitz-Birkenau complex in March 1943, and about 7,640 in February (Mattogno 2023a, Part 2, p. 193).

Another confirmation that Crematorium II had no relation to the claimed mass murder of Jewish inmates is the fact that, as mentioned earlier, this facility went into operation on 20 February 1943 according to a report dated 29 March 1943:¹⁸⁷

The Topf Company installed an air-intake and extraction system in Morgues #1 of Crematoria II and III, and an air-extraction system in Morgues #2. Under no circumstances should Prüfer and Schultze have spoken of four “gas chambers,” because from an orthodox point of view, it would have been at most two “gas chambers” and two “undressing rooms.”

¹⁸⁶ Letter from the SS garrison physician to the commandant of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp dated 20 March 1943, with the subject “Häftlings-Krankenbau – KGL”; RGVA, 502-1-261, p. 112.

¹⁸⁷ Tätigkeitsbericht des SS-Ustuf. (F) Kirschnek, Bauleiter für das Schutzhaftlager und für landwirtschaftliche Bauvorhaben. Zeit 1. Januar 1943 bis 31. März 1943, dated 29 March 1943; RGVA, 502-1-26, p. 59.

This is to be understood in the sense that cremations began, at least on a reduced or experimental basis, because the forced-draft systems had been installed on the 18th and 19th of January,¹⁸⁸ so the cremation furnaces were ready for use, but the ventilation system of Morgue #1, the alleged homicidal gas chamber, was put into operation only on 13 March. Therefore, the Central Construction Office was interested in the cremation of the bodies of registered inmates who died in the camp, yet evidently not in the “gassing” of unregistered deportees.

At the same time, Prüfer made a disproportionate concession to the Soviet thesis by asserting that the crematoria normally operated 24 hours a day. This is blatant nonsense, because coke-fired furnaces normally required a daily pause of 3-4 hours for cleaning the hearth grates (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 315f.). This was even stated by Henryk Tauber:¹⁸⁹

“In Crematoria Nos. 2 and 3, the cremation of corpses in the furnaces was carried out during the entire day, except for a break to remove the slag, but for at least 21 hours.”

9. Structure and Operation of the Crematoria

9.1. Fritz Sander’s “Continuously Operating Corpse-Cremation Furnace for Mass Use”

During his first interrogation, Sander was immediately asked the following question point-blank:¹⁹⁰

“Tell us about your invention of the crematorium for mass incineration!”

The Topf engineer replied as follows:

“As a leading engineer at the Topf Company, I was head of the crematorium construction department, headed by Prüfer. The latter told me in 1942, I don’t remember the exact date, during a conversation about the capacity of the crematoria that had been built in Auschwitz Concentration Camp, that they could not cope with the number of corpses to be cremated. He cited the example that two or three corpses were inserted into the insertion openings, but that the crematorium could not cope with the workload in the concentration camps.”

¹⁹⁰ Protocol of the interrogation of F. Sander dated 7 March 1946.

At that time, as a specialist in the field of heating, I decided on my own initiative to build a crematorium with a higher capacity for cremating corpses. In November 1942, I had finished my project for a crematorium for mass cremation of corpses, and submitted it to the Reich Patent Office in Berlin.

The crematorium for mass cremation was to be designed according to the principle of the conveyor-belt system, and corpses were to be continuously pushed into the furnace for cremation by mechanical means.

The corpses were to enter the furnace under their own weight, falling by themselves onto the grate on a refractory surface with an inclination of 40 degrees, and burning under the effect of the fire. The corpses themselves were to serve as an additional source of fuel.

This patent could not be officially registered with the state patent office because it was secret due to the war, but my invention was put into practice, and I was given the [patent] number. ”

Asked during the same interrogation about the cremation capacity of the facility he designed, Sander said evasively:

“The number of corpses that can be incinerated in one hour in the crematorium I designed is significantly higher than the number incinerated in a [conventional] cremation furnace.”

Sander also explained during the interview, why and under what circumstances he had come up with such a project:

“In the summer of 1942, Prüfer and Schultze reported to me that, in the concentration camps of Auschwitz, many people were exterminated in gas chambers, and their corpses burned in crematoria, whereby the strain on the crematoria was so great that three corpses were put into one furnace opening [concurrently]. ”

During his second interrogation, he specified:¹⁹¹

“After his return from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, Prüfer told me that he had been present during the testing of the crematoria built there, and had come to the conclusion that they were not very efficient and could not cope with the number of corpses that had to be cremated there.”

During his third interrogation, Sander asserted:¹⁹²

“I remember well that this conversation between me and engineer Prüfer took place in the spring of 1942 – I can’t remember the exact month – after engineer Prüfer had returned from a business trip from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, where he had checked the furnaces in the newly built crematorium. [...]

After the engineer Prüfer had informed me that the cremation furnaces we had built in Auschwitz were too small to incinerate the corpses there, I told him that it was essential to design cremation furnaces based on the conveyor-belt system for the mass incineration of corpses in the concentration camps.”

¹⁹¹ Protocol of the interrogation of F. Sander dated 13 March 1946.

¹⁹² Protocol of the interrogation of F. Sander dated 21 March 1946.

The reality is quite different. On 26 October 1942, Fritz Sander drafted a patent application for a “Continuously operating corpse-cremation furnace for mass use,” which he then revised on 4 November 1942.¹⁹³

No patent was evidently granted, but this has nothing to do with the fanciful reasons given by Sander, namely “because it was secret due to the war.” In fact, as Sander himself noted, mass cremation in Germany was illegal, and his project therefore had to disregard legal provisions:¹⁹⁴

“In that case it is obvious that one cannot proceed in accordance with the legal requirements in force in the Reich territory.”

For Germany’s National Patent Office, this was certainly a much more serious reason not to grant the patent.

Sander’s account is completely fabricated. He claimed to have gotten the idea for the new design after a talk about “the capacity of the crematoria” with Prüfer, who was on his way back from Auschwitz, where he had gone together with Schultze,¹⁹⁵ an unmistakable reference to Prüfer’s and Schultze’s visit to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March 1943. Hence, on the one hand, the conversation could not have taken place “in the spring of 1942,” as Sander claimed, and on the other hand, by the time the conversation took place, Sander had already been working on his design for six months!

In fact, already on 14 September 1942, Sander wrote the Topf brothers a letter expounding to them the “new design” of the crematorium he had conceived (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 288f.).

Sander’s design was nothing but an adaptation of Topf’s waste incinerator, which basically had been copied from Kori’s “Furnace with two combustion chambers” (ibid., Vol. I, pp. 288-291; Vol. II, Doc. 225, p. 380). The idea of a vertical cylindrical combustion chamber, on the other hand, was taken from Adolf Marsch’s patent for a “Shaft furnace for the concurrent cremation of a larger number of human corpses or animal carcasses,” dated 30 September 1915 (ibid., pp. 151-153).

Pressac had drawn attention to Sander’s project in his 1989 book, but without attaching any particular importance to it (Pressac 1989, pp. 100-102).

¹⁹⁵ “What did Prüfer and Schultze tell you after their business trip to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp,” Protocol of the interrogation of F. Sander dated 7 March 1946.

Quite different was later the attitude of Robert Jan van Pelt, who, by virtue of his abysmal incompetence in the field of cremation, unbelievably insisted that this project somehow proved the veracity of the absurd cremation capacity of the Birkenau furnaces as alleged by Henryk Tauber. For an in-depth historical-technical study of this issue, I refer to a specific study of mine (Mattoigno 2020, esp. pp. 17-61).

9.2. Civilian Furnaces versus Concentration-Camp Furnaces

Asked about the structural differences between the furnaces in civilian crematoria and those installed in concentration-camp crematoria, Prüfer replied:¹⁹⁶

“In civilian crematoria, there was one opening (muffle) for the cremation of the corpse, in rare cases two. In the crematoria for the concentration camps, there were three insertion openings. The size of the insertion opening was smaller in the crematoria for the concentration camps – 70 x 70 cm – and two meters long, compared to 90 x 90 cm and two meters thirty in the civil crematoria. Instead of a trolley on rails, on which the corpse in a coffin is moved into the opening, in the crematoria for the concentration camps, the corpse is pushed into the furnace on a hand-carried stretcher without a coffin. In the civilian crematoria, a special bellows is used to blow in preheated air, which causes the corpse to burn more quickly and without smoke. The construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps is different; it does not allow the air to be heated in advance, which is why the corpse burns more slowly and with smoke. Ventilation is used to reduce the smoke and the smell of the burning corpse.”

During another interrogation, he added:¹⁹⁷

“The difference between the crematoria I designed and built for the concentration camps and the other civilian crematoria I built is that in the furnaces of the former, there were three insertion openings/muffles, and in the latter there was only one, rarely two. The crematoria with three openings were built because they had a larger capacity, i.e. more bodies could be cremated in them. In addition, these crematoria also saved fuel.”

I summarize and explain. Civilian cremation furnaces had only single-muffle furnaces, usually one or two, rarely three; in the concentration camps, the Topf Company installed double-muffle, triple-muffle and eight-muffle cremation furnaces. The last two types had intercommunicating muffles.

In the following table, I give the muffle dimensions of furnaces for civilian crematoria (maximum permissible dimensions according to the 1937

¹⁹⁶ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 5 March 1946.

¹⁹⁷ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 15 March 1946.

German “Guidelines for the Construction of Furnaces for the Cremation of Human Corpses” (see Grossdeutscher Verband), and the dimensions of Topf furnaces as set up at Auschwitz.

Table 2: Muffle dimension of civilian and concentration-camp cremation furnaces

	Civilian	Topf 2-muffle	Topf 3-muffle ¹⁹⁸	Topf 8-muffle
Height	900 mm	700 mm	800 mm	700 mm
Width	900 mm	700 mm	700 mm	700 mm
Length	2500 mm	2000 mm	2000 mm	2000 mm

The smaller size of the muffles of the concentration-camp furnaces depended mainly on the fact that cremation was originally planned with a light coffin of rough boards that was much smaller than a regular coffin, and also on the need for material saving by reducing the overall size of the furnace.

Initially, Topf furnaces were also equipped with a “coffin-introduction device” mounted on wheels running on tracks, similar in function to that of civilian furnaces. Only from March 1943 was the system of “corpse stretchers” introduced at Auschwitz.

The civilian coke-fired crematoria were equipped with a “recuperator” consisting of a refractory-clay duct or metal pipes heated externally by high-temperature fumes. In it, the combustion air fed into the furnace was heated up to 600°C. The heated air in the recuperator entered the muffle by virtue of the chimney draft. There were no “bellows” (mexa, mekha) that performed this function, unless by that term one means blowers.

Topf’s civilian furnaces heated with gas or electricity were in fact equipped with a blower outside the furnace that blew preheated combustion air into the muffle. Concentration-camp furnaces had no recuperator, so the combustion air entering the muffle was cold.

These devices moreover had other drawbacks not stated by Prüfer; the main ones are as follows:

- absence of technical instruments: electric pyrometers to control the temperature in the muffle and at the bottom of the furnace; draft gauges to control the draft in the chimney and the hearth; combustion-gas analyzers (gas testers) to monitor the combustion;
- inability to regulate the air blower of the triple-muffle furnace, so that combustion air was blown into all three muffles simultaneously, without the possibility of blocking or regulating the air flow in each of them independently;

- inability to regulate the chimney draft for each muffle (in the triple-muffle furnace, a single smoke damper simultaneously regulated the smoke flow of all three muffles; in the 8-muffle furnace, a single smoke damper simultaneously regulated the smoke flow of four muffles);
- inability to accelerate the coke-combustion process on the hearth grate and the cremation process in the muffle due to the absence of forced-draft devices.

As a result of these disadvantages, as Prüfer pointed out, the corpse burned “more slowly and with smoke.” To prevent the formation of smoke and foul odor, Prüfer continued, “a ventilation,” i.e., a blower was employed. Indeed, at that time it was believed that smoke depended exclusively on a lack of combustion air, and that it was sufficient to introduce sufficient air to eliminate it immediately. Prüfer himself had harshly criticized Eng. Hans Volckmann’s discovery of laminar currents (which traced the formation of smoke back to poor mixing of combustible gases and particles with the combustion air; Prüfer 1931, pp. 27-29), which did have its importance,¹⁹⁹ although it was not the only determining factor.²⁰⁰ In the case of smoke formation in the triple-muffle furnaces, introducing more cold air with a blower would certainly have worsened the situation, both because, as I have already explained, the system could not be adjusted for each individual muffle, and because the supply of cold air would inevitably have cooled all three muffles, making it more difficult for combustion air, gases, and combustible particles to mix, ignite and burn completely, and also decreasing the draft in the flue and consequently the amount of air getting drawn through the hearth, resulting in less heat being supplied into the muffles, hence a further decrease in temperature.

The “larger capacity” that Prüfer attributed to multi-muffle furnaces built in concentration camps compared to civilian furnaces thus depended not on better performance, but on the purely quantitative factor of the greater number of available muffles.

¹⁹⁹ One of the advantages of using combustion air preheated in recuperators was precisely that it promoted the mixing of the air’s oxygen with unburned gases and carbon particles, thus improving the combustion.

²⁰⁰ The formation of smoke could depend on several factors: lack of combustion air/oxygen; poor mixing of combustion air with combustible gases and particles; insufficient temperature in the muffle; excessive volumetric velocity of combustible gases and particles, which passes through the muffle too fast to burn out completely inside the muffle, and then cools too much in the smoke duct to keep burning.

One of the advantages of concentration-camp furnaces – in addition to lower cost – was lower fuel consumption. This was due to the small structure of these devices, which, having a very light refractory mass, required much less fuel to reach operating temperature and thermal equilibrium.²⁰¹

In practice, civilian furnaces were more efficient, whereas Topf's furnaces for concentration camps were cheaper.

In Schultze's description of the differences between the civilian furnaces and those at Auschwitz-Birkenau, he was even more cursory. In his view, they were limited to the number of muffles and the system of corpse introduction. Compared to Prüfer, however, he gave an indication related to his field of expertise:²⁰²

"The power of the ventilators in the ventilation systems of the concentration-camp crematoria was 5-6 hp instead of three hp as in the furnace of an ordinary crematorium."

This is an unsubstantiated claim, because the blowers of the double-muffle furnaces were driven by a 1.5-hp motor with Blower No. 120, while those of the triple-muffle furnaces had 3-hp motors with Blower No. 275.²⁰³

9.3. Cremation Capacity

During the interrogation of 5 March 1946, Soviet investigator Shatunovsky asked Prüfer the following question:

"How many corpses could be cremated per hour in a crematorium in Auschwitz?"

The Topf engineer answered:

"In a crematorium with five furnaces or fifteen openings (muffles), fifteen corpses were cremated in one hour."

This corresponds to the cremation of one corpse per muffle in one hour, or a theoretical capacity of Crematoria II/III of 360 corpses each in 24 hours. The day before, Schultze, who was perfectly familiar with the triple-muffle furnaces because he had designed and built their blowers, had stated:²⁰⁴

"There were five furnaces in each of the two crematoria, and three corpses were placed in each furnace, i.e. there were three openings (muffles) in each furnace. Within one hour, fifteen corpses could be cremated in a crematorium with five furnaces."

²⁰¹ The lower fuel consumption also depended on other technical factors related to the small size of the muffles and, for the triple- and 8-muffle furnaces, especially the heat interchange between the muffles.

²⁰² Protocol of the interrogation of K. Schultze dated 4 March 1946.

²⁰³ The blower number gives the diameter of pressure tube in mm.

²⁰⁴ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Schultze dated 4 March 1946.

He too confirmed the cremation capacity of one corpse per muffle per hour. Exactly because these statements are fully in accordance with reality,²⁰⁵ for that very reason, they stand in stark contrast to the purely propagandistic “expert report” written on behalf of the Soviet Commission of Inquiry into Auschwitz by the Polish engineers Dawidowski and Doliński and the Russian engineers Lavrushin and Shuer. According to their report, 3 to 5 corpses per muffle could be cremated simultaneously in 20 to 30 minutes in the triple-muffle furnaces. Thus, the cremation capacity of Crematoria II and III was set at 3,000 corpses per day.²⁰⁶ This absurd cremation capacity was then made official in the final report of the aforementioned Commission, which was published by Pravda on 7 May 1945. In spite of all this, neither Shatunovsky nor the other “Smersh” investigators ever objected to Prüfer and Schultze’s statements. Why?

This is all the more strange because, during the interrogation of 4 March 1948, Soviet investigators Doperchuk and Novikov had in their hands a photocopy of Bischoff’s famous letter of 28 June 1943 – later attached to the record – according to which Crematoria II and III could each cremate 1,440 corpses in 24 hours, exactly four times the capacity claimed by Prüfer and Schultze.²⁰⁷ Nevertheless, they used the document only for an utterly derisory dispute: Prüfer had claimed that two double-muffle furnaces had been installed in Crematorium I, whereas the investigators noted that Bischoff’s letter of 28 June 1943 mentions three.²⁰⁸ On the other hand, the two Soviet investigators knew perfectly well the contents of Prüfer’s previous interrogations; in fact, when he told the story of the gas chamber in Crematorium I, they were quick to object:²⁰⁹

“Then why did you state during the earlier interrogations that you first learned in 1943 of the real purpose of the crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?”

Why then did the two investigators not also challenge him on his claim regarding the cremation capacity of the triple-muffle furnaces? The explanation for this deliberate omission lies perhaps in the fact that a closer examination of the cremation issue would have been totally at odds with the thesis of mass extermination at Auschwitz. In fact, within the mythical figure of four million victims at Auschwitz, the largest share of the alleged gassings and cremations – 3,200,000 – pertained to the crematoria at Birkenau. This share had been calculated by the above-mentioned “experts” on the basis of a claimed cremation capacity of these facilities of 270,000 corpses per month – a decidedly insane capacity, eight times higher than the theoretical one! Despite the adjustment “coefficients” introduced by the experts to take into account the periods of inactivity of the crematoria, the final result still corresponded to a cremation capacity five times higher than the theoretical one. (See in this regard Mattogno 2003.)

Bischoff’s letter of 28 June 1943 was also shown by Soviet investigators to Schultze and Braun. They asked the former on 11 March 1948:

“Question: We show you a photocopy of a report of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz death camp dated 28 June 1943, from which it appears that in said camp in the crematoria and gas chambers built and set up with your personal participation, 4,756 inmates were exterminated per day. What can you say about the contents of this document?”

Answer: I have no reason to dispute these official figures. The document shown to me testifies in favor of the fact that in the Auschwitz crematoria and gas chambers built and equipped with my direct participation, more than 4,700 inmates were exterminated per day.”

Leaving aside the nonsensical Soviet claim that a maximum cremation capacity (however fictitious) corresponded to an extermination actually carried out, Schultze accepted the letter’s figures without objection, even though they were in open conflict with his statement that the triple-muffle cremation furnaces had a capacity of one corpse per hour per muffle. With reference to the 52 muffles mentioned in the document, this would correspond to $(52 \times 24 \text{ h/day}) = 1,248$ corpses in 24 hours versus 4,756, so Schultze had very good grounds “to dispute these official figures.”

Braun also accepted these absurd data without objection in his interrogation on 26 February 1948:

“Question: We are presenting you with photocopies of parts of a correspondence between the Topf and Sons Company and the Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, which show that, between 1940 and 1943, the company built and equipped five powerful crematoria with gas chambers in the said camp, in which more than 4,700 prisoners were exterminated every day. What can you say about the documents presented to you?”

Answer: The documents presented to me do indeed show that five powerful crematoria were built by the Topf and Sons Company with my participation in the Auschwitz death camp, in which more than 4,700 prisoners were exterminated every day.” (Emphasis added)

I will return to the issue of cremation capacity of the Birkenau crematoria in Chapter 11.7.

9.4. The “Huge Load” of the Cremation Furnaces

As is evident from what I set out in Chapter 6, Prüfer stated that two of his visits to Auschwitz – in the spring of 1943 and early 1944 – were due to damage to the crematorium chimneys. When questioned on this point, he replied:²¹⁰

“The inner fireclay lining of the crematorium chimneys in Auschwitz began to crumble after only half a year as a result of the huge load to which these crematoria were exposed in the concentration camp.”

What does this “huge load” refer to? Let us examine the facts. One must first understand the meaning of the text. The Russian term “труба, truba,” meaning “pipe,” here designates the smoke duct that led from the muffle to the chimney mouth (in German Rauchkanal or Fuchs) or the chimney flue (in German Kaminzug).

The first chimney suffering serious damage was that of Crematorium I. On 1 June 1942, Bischoff sent a letter to the camp commandant, in which he wrote, among other things:²¹¹

The date is important: Until the 1st of June 1942, the claimed extermination, according to the Auschwitz Chronicle,²¹² was limited to the “gassing” of 6,800 Jews in the so-called “Bunker 1.” However, these corpses are said to have been buried rather than burned. Therefore, the “huge load” that caused irreparable damage to the chimney in this case was due to the corpses of inmates who had died a “natural death.” However, by May 1942, more than 3,300 inmates had died, an average of 106 per day (Matogno 2023a, Part 2, p. 190). If, as the orthodoxy claims (based on Bischoff’s letter of 28 June 1943), Crematorium I’s cremation capacity was 340 corpses in 24 hours, on average its furnaces would have worked for $([106 \times 24 \text{ h/day}] \div 340/\text{day} =)$ about 7.5 hours a day, and Bischoff’s claim regarding “day and night” operation would be absurd. But since the actual cremation capacity was only one corpse per muffle and hour (= theoretically 144 in 24 hours), it would have taken the furnaces an average of $([106 \times 24 \text{ h/day}] \div 144/\text{day} =)$ about 17.5 hours each day to cremate these 106 corpses (not including the time needed for the furnace to heat up to operating temperature). This fully justifies Bischoff's claim.

The damage to the chimney at Crematorium II, mentioned by Prüfer in connection with his visit to Auschwitz in the "spring" of 1943, had actually occurred a few days before 24 March 1943. At first, the Central Construction Office did not realize the severity of the damage. Believing that the three forced-draft devices had simply failed, it sent for Prüfer and Schultze, who, as I have already noted, visited Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March. It was soon ascertained that the refractory lining of the chimney had collapsed or become damaged, and that "whole parts of the vaults" of the smoke ducts had also collapsed.²¹³ The damage was discovered in early April, because on Prüfer's visit to Auschwitz at this time, the Central Construction Office had asked him for "a new suggestion concerning the chimney lining."²¹⁴

The Central Construction Office opened an investigation to ascertain responsibility, and summoned both Robert Koehler, the builder of the chimney, and Prüfer, who had drawn up the design. In the final report, Kirschnek noted, with reference to Prüfer:²¹⁵

"On his last but one visit, he named, in the presence of the commandant, the great stresses due to the firing of only single furnaces – something not considered in the design – to have been the cause.

In the opinion of the Central Construction Office, this may indeed be the main cause, and has now been taken into account in the new design by Topf and Sons, in that the lining contains various types of openings,^[216] which allows individual lining parts to move in a sliding manner so that the elasticity of the lining masonry takes into account the stresses that may occur when individual furnaces are heated."

The main cause of the chimney damage was thus closely related to the "firing of only single furnaces." However, if 8,328 corpses of Jews and Gypsies allegedly gassed on 14, 16, 20, 23, and 24 March 1943 (see Chapter 9.5.) were really cremated in this crematorium, all five furnaces would have had to operate at maximum capacity at all times. Even under the theoretically most favorable conditions, they would have taken over 17 actual days to accomplish this task.²¹⁷ The use of only individual furnaces in Crematorium II, for instance three of the five, on the other hand, would have ensured the cremation of only some 189 corpses within 21 hours, a figure compatible with the daily “natural” mortality rate of about 180 deaths.

The above-mentioned case is part of the normal fuel-saving practice of periodically employing individual furnaces or groups of furnaces on a continuous basis.²¹⁸ This way, they remained hot at all times,²¹⁹ and allowed for faster reactivation and great fuel savings. This practice is documented for the Theresienstadt crematorium, which was equipped with four oil-fired cremation furnaces from the Ignis-Hüttenbau Company of Teplitz-Schönau. In fact, here only one furnace was used in rotation at a time, but continuously in two shifts for 13-14 hours a day.²²⁰

Regarding the furnaces at Birkenau Crematorium II, I have already explained that they had three smoke ducts that led to three separate chimney flues. Into the first duct and flue flowed the smoke from furnaces 1 and 2; into the second the smoke from furnaces 3 and 4; and into the third the smoke from furnace 5 and the waste incinerator. If the two furnaces of any pair were not lit, the corresponding chimney flue remained cold, while the other two heated up, which caused stresses that damaged its refractory lining.

The damage to the three forced-draft devices “due to excessive temperatures” depended instead on an error in the design of the triple-muffle furnace: fumes from the two lateral muffles flowed into the central muffle of the same size, which thus had to accommodate twice the volume of combustion gases. This doubled the speed with which the combustion gas flowed. As a result, some of the combustion gas entered the smoke duct still burning, thus increasing the temperature in the smoke duct and chimney. As I noted earlier, the three forced-draft devices were located in three separate service rooms. If all three of them were damaged, it is clear that the five furnaces were put into operation all at once. This seems to be alluded to by a sentence in Kirschnek’s file memo of 25 March 1943, which I quoted earlier, indicating that these devices were damaged “because of excessive temperatures after the first operation at full capacity.” The most likely scenario, then, is that the crematorium’s operation began “at full capacity” in order to dispose of the bodies that had accumulated in the local morgues as soon as possible. However, after a few days, when the situation had normalized, operation continued with the use of only individual furnaces.

²¹⁸ This practice obviously presupposed a relatively limited number of corpses to be cremated.

²¹⁹ The daily interruption for cleaning the hearth grates caused little heat loss compared to the heat stored in the entire furnace body.

From the orthodox perspective, however, the use of individual furnaces is meaningless because, as noted earlier, all five furnaces at the crematorium would have taken more than 17 days to dispose of the bodies of the alleged 6,342 gassing victims.

9.5. Multiple-Body Cremations

Prüfer, Sander and Schultze's statements contain some references to multiple-body cremations. Prüfer stated:²²¹

"I reported to Sander that I had been present during the testing of the furnaces in the crematorium of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and had come to the conclusion that the crematoria could not cope with the number of corpses to be cremated there, as the furnaces of the crematoria were not efficient enough. I gave Sander the example that in Auschwitz, in my presence, two corpses were shoved into an introduction opening/muffle instead of just one, and that the furnaces of the crematorium could not cope with this load because there were so many corpses to burn. At that time, I also told Sander that the corpses I had seen were of people who had previously been murdered in gas chambers."

As already quoted earlier, here is how Sander told this tale:²²²

"As a leading engineer at the Topf Company, I was head of the crematorium construction department, headed by Prüfer. The latter told me in 1942, I don't remember the exact date, during a conversation about the capacity of the crematoria that had been built in Auschwitz Concentration Camp, that they could not cope with the number of corpses to be cremated. He cited the example that two or three corpses were inserted into the insertion openings, but that the crematorium could not cope with the workload in the concentration camps. [...]"

In the summer of 1942, Prüfer and Schultze reported to me that in the concentration camps of Auschwitz many people were exterminated in gas chambers, and their corpses burned in crematoria, whereby the strain on the crematoria was so great that three corpses were put into one furnace opening [concurrently]."

Such a claim makes no sense from the orthodox point of view, because in the summer of 1942, only the so-called "bunkers" at Birkenau are said to have been in operation as homicidal gas chambers. However, their alleged victims were not incinerated "in crematoria," but buried.

Later Sander added:²²³

²²¹ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 19 March 1946.

²²² Protocol of the interrogation of F. Sander dated 7 March 1946.

“This had to do with the fact that, after the construction of the crematoria, the Topf Company sent their people to the concentration camps to assemble the crematoria, and engineer Prüfer, as the construction manager and designer of the crematoria, went to the concentration camp to inspect how the assembly work was going; he was also present during the practical testing of the crematoria.

After his return from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, Prüfer told me that he had been present during the testing of the crematoria built there, and had come to the conclusion that they were not very efficient and could not cope with the number of corpses that had to be cremated there. At the time, Prüfer gave me the example that, in his presence, two corpses at a time had been introduced into the opening of the crematoria, but the latter [the furnaces] had not been able to cope with the workload because there were so many corpses to be cremated in the concentration camp.”

Prüfer tried to keep up with Sander’s game of mendacity concerning the genesis of his new mass-cremation furnace. He allegedly reported to Sander that the five triple-muffle furnaces in Crematorium II had too small a cremation capacity in relation to the number of corpses to be cremated, so Sander would devise his “Continuously operating corpse-cremation furnace for mass use.” But as noted earlier, this concatenation of events is completely false.

On the other hand, Prüfer’s account of the multiple cremations undoubtedly refers to his visit to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March 1943. He stated about this visit that six corpses were cremated in his presence in two furnaces, thus one corpse in each muffle, which is fully in accordance with his and Schultze’s statement that the cremation capacity of the furnaces of Crematorium II was one corpse per hour per muffle.

According to his own account, Prüfer had found in the furnace room of Crematorium II 60 corpses, which could be cremated in as little as four hours. But if that was so, then how could he claim that the amount of corpses to be cremated was such that it could not be disposed of even by multiple cremations?

Finally, Prüfer himself had designed the triple-muffle furnaces for the cremation of only one corpse at a time – as, by the way, was clearly stated in the “Operating Instructions” for these furnaces.²²⁴ Therefore, he knew perfectly well that a possible load of two or three corpses per muffle would not have increased the capacity of the furnaces at all, but would have proportionally prolonged the duration of cremation and the consumption of coke.

The significance of Prüfer's experiment, as I explained in another study (Mattoigno 2005, pp. 40-43), is this: in the passage quoted earlier, Prüfer stated that single cremations could not cope with the large number of corpses to be cremated (actually just 60, if we follow his statements). Therefore, in his presence, the cremation of multiple corpses placed concurrently in one muffle were attempted, but despite the fact that two to three corpses were loaded into each muffle together, the problem of the (allegedly) large number of corpses to be cremated could not be solved. The reason for this was the fact that the cremation capacity of the furnaces had not increased at all.

In this context, the Russian phrase "ne spravlyalis' s tojy nagruzkoj" means that the furnaces were not up to such a load of corpses, that is, they could not cremate them as cost-effectively as they would cremate a load of only one corpse per muffle. The word "nagruzka," "load," corresponds to the German "Beladung" and refers to the contents of the muffle, while "kolichestvo," "quantity, number," is equivalent to "Belastung," which refers to the "load" of the furnace in the sense of the frequency of cremations.²²⁵

If in fact the multiple-cremation experiment had succeeded according to the orthodox perspective, that is, if it had turned out that two or three corpses together were incinerated in the same time required by one, the cremation capacity would have doubled or tripled. But then, why did Prüfer say, and Sander confirm, that the furnaces still could not cope with the alleged large number of corpses to be cremated? From this perspective, the evidence of multiple cremations would also be illogical and contradictory: if Prüfer knew in advance that even cremating three corpses placed concurrently in one muffle would still not solve the claimed problem of the large number of corpses to be cremated, why did he run the multiple-cremation experiment?

Prüfer thus experimentally confirmed just the opposite, namely, that multiple-corpse cremations did not increase the cremation capacity of the furnaces.

This fact had already been acknowledged by Sander in his letter of 14 September 1942, which I mentioned earlier (reproduced in Schüle, pp. 443-447):

²²⁵ It should be kept in mind that Prüfer and Schultze's statements were translated from German into Russian by interpreters who often mistranslated technical terms, such as when they attributed "ventilation" to the crematoria.

“In my opinion, cremation in the muffle furnaces is not fast enough to dispose of a large number of bodies in a desirably short time. This is why a large number of furnaces or muffles are used, and the individual muffles are stuffed with several corpses, without, however, remedying the root cause, namely the defects of the muffle system.

In my opinion, these deficiencies of the muffle furnaces, which are not eliminated by combining them into four-muffle furnaces (three- or eight-muffle furnaces) and by stuffing the individual muffles with several bodies concurrently, are as follows:”

Sander then listed three main flaws, the second of which mentions multiple-corpse cremations:

“2) Problems of introduction. In any case, it is difficult and unpleasant work to insert the corpses into the muffle in the longitudinal direction, especially if several corpses have to be packed into the muffle concurrently. In the long run, it will also be impossible to avoid damaging the delicate muffle masonry.”

The reference in the above letter to “several corpses... concurrently” stuffed in one muffle, which was certainly possible albeit not economically viable, does not concern the essential issue of cremation capacity, but merely the far more marginal one of the difficulty of loading several bodies concurrently into one cremation muffle. Sander does not say whether loading multiple corpses together into one muffle increased their cremation capacity correspondingly, although he did say that this did not solve the problem. He merely reported that this practice led to difficulties when introducing the corpses into the muffle. As I have shown elsewhere, this problem (on par level with that of damage to the refractory masonry) really only and exclusively arose when two or more corpses were loaded into one muffle concurrently. To be precise, while the simultaneous introduction of two adult corpses into one muffle was difficult, loading three adult corpses concurrently was physically impossible, because the frame of Topf’s muffle door had standard dimensions of 60 cm × 60 cm, with the top half shaped as a semi-circle. Introducing one corpse at a time, either with the convenient corpse-introducing device or even with the simpler stretcher, did not cause any difficulty, because each muffle was equipped with sliding rollers for these devices.²²⁶

In order to extol the merits of his design, Sander therefore had to accentuate the flaws of multi-muffle furnaces, and to this end he was forced to introduce the flaw of the difficulty of simultaneously introducing several corpses into a muffle, because he could not mention the nonexistent flaw of introducing only one corpse at a time.

The fundamental problem also remains: from whom and when did Sander learn about the simultaneous cremation of multiple corpses in one muffle? According to Sander's and Prüfer's statements, this was supposedly done by Prüfer after his return to Erfurt from his visit to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March 1943. But as we have seen, this is impossible. On the other hand, this is the only occasion on which, according to Prüfer and Schultze, multiple corpses could have been cremated simultaneously in a furnace muffle at Auschwitz in Prüfer's presence. All of this confirms that Sander was not referring to actual experiences of multiple-corpse cremations of which he was aware as early as September 1942, but to a conjecture of convenience to attribute to the multiple-muffle furnaces a flaw that was overcome by his new design.

Seen from the general orthodox point of view, the idea of the necessity of multiple-corpse cremations to increase the cremation capacity of the furnaces seems nonsensical. Assuming as real the capacity figures listed in the letter by the Central Construction Office dated 28 June 1943, the ten triple-muffle furnaces of Crematories II and III could have cremated 2,880 corpses per day with single-corpse cremations. In 1942, the month of the highest actual and presumed mortality at Auschwitz was August, when about 36,000 victims are said to have been gassed (if we follow Czech's Auschwitz Chronicle), and about 8,600 inmates perished of a "natural" death (Mattogno 2023a, Part 2, p. 190). This amounts to a total of 44,600 deaths, averaging about 1,440 per day, hence exactly the daily cremation capacity attributed to Crematorium II when assuming single-corpse cremations.

It is documented that, as late as 3 August 1942, only one new crematorium (the future Crematorium II) was planned for the Birkenau Camp, and that the decision to build three more crematoria in that camp was made during this month (Mattogno 2019, pp. 302f.). Hence, this month's mortality was supposed to be the benchmark for the cremation capacity to be adopted.²²⁷ However, the one that was adopted, if we follow the orthodox narrative, was disproportionately higher: 4,756 corpses per day versus 1,440.

In fact, the decision to build the future Crematoria III, IV and V depended on two concomitant factors: on the one hand, the panic by which the camp administration was seized in August 1942 due to the extremely ²²⁷ In the preceding months, the number of alleged gassings was very small: about 7,000 in May, as many in June, and about 5,000 in July. Data according to the Czech 1990.

high mortality rate caused by a typhus epidemic and other infectious diseases spinning out of control; on the other hand, Himmler's July 1942 order to expand Birkenau's occupancy from the 120,000 inmates originally planned to a whopping 200,000 inmates.²²⁸

The need for the use of multiple-corpse cremations to increase the cremation capacity of the furnaces in early 1943 is particularly nonsensical even from an orthodox point of view. The time when this is said to have happened could not refer to Schultze's visit to Auschwitz on 1 March 1943, for the reasons given earlier. However, regarding Schultze's and Prüfer's visit on 24 and 25 March, I have already explained that the Central Construction Office had become aware of the damage to the forced-draft devices in Crematorium II at least a few days earlier. According to Czech's Auschwitz Chronicle, during this period, 1,700 Gypsies (23 March), 1,986 Greek Jews (24 March) and another 1,206 Greek Jews (25 March) were allegedly gassed. If assuming the orthodox position, then one cannot seriously believe that the Central Construction Office on the one hand had urgently requested, by telegraph, the presence in Auschwitz of the two Topf engineers to repair or replace the burned-out devices, but on the other hand had allowed the quiet continuation of mass gassings and cremations of Jews. What is more, neither Schultze nor Prüfer reported anything about the above-mentioned alleged mass gassings (of 1,986 and 1,206 persons) on 24 and 25 March. In fact, they implicitly ruled out that Morgue #1 was filled with the bodies of the 1,700 Gypsies allegedly gassed in that room on the 23rd of March, because had these dead Jews been lying around in the crematorium's basement, then the SS would not have had to carry out a gassing of 300 additional persons in order to procure corpses for the functional testing of the forced-draft devices and cremation furnaces, as Schultze had claimed.

According to the letter from the Central Construction Office dated 28 June 1943, the five triple-muffle furnaces of Crematorium II could cremate 1,440 "persons" within 24 hours, or 600 per hour.

According to Czech's Auschwitz Chronicle, from the opening of the crematorium (14 March 1943) to 24 March, five "gassings" of altogether 8,328 victims had been carried out, namely:

1. 1,492 Jews from Krakow on 14 March
2. 959 Jews from Krakow on 16 March
3. 2,191 Greek Jews on 20 March

²²⁸ Mattogno 2019, Chapter 8.7.5, "Increase of Cremation Capacity at Birkenau," pp. 261f., and pp. 301-305.

4. 1,700 Gypsies on 23 March
5. 1,986 Greek Jews on 24 March,

Assuming the cremation capacity as claimed by the orthodoxy – 60 bodies per hour for Crematorium II (four bodies per muffle and hour) – the cremation of the claimed gassing victims would have been wrapped up for each gassing batch as follows:

1. $1,492 \div 60/h \approx 25$ hours, cremation finished on 15 March
2. $959 \div 60/h \approx 16$ hours, cremation finished on 16 or 17 March
3. $2,191 \div 60/h \approx 38$ hours, cremation finished on 21 March
4. $1,700 \div 60/h \approx 28$ hours, cremation finished on 24 March
5. $1,986 \div 60/h \approx 33$ hours, cremation finished on 25 March

Therefore, on 24 and 25 March 1943, Prüfer and Schultze would have witnessed the cremation of 1,986 corpses (of which they knew nothing), which supposedly caused no difficulties (and neither did the cremation of 2,191 corpses on 20 March, if we follow the orthodoxy). But if that was so, then why did Prüfer and Sander state that the furnaces “were not very efficient and could not cope with the number of corpses that had to be cremated there,” that they “could not cope with the number of corpses”?

Even from the orthodox perspective of mass gassings, this complaint of a hugely insufficient cremation capacity makes sense only if the furnaces could cremate only one corpse per muffle in one hour, as both Prüfer and Schultze stated.

Moreover, the continuous use of all furnaces for 24 hours a day, as I have already noted, is in open contrast to the Central Construction Office’s statement of 14 September 1943 regarding the heating of only individual furnaces.

Whichever way one examines it, the story of multiple-corpse cremations is therefore patently nonsensical, as is the two engineers’ entire account of the “gas chamber” at Crematorium II.

As noted earlier, Prüfer’s and Schultze’s account fits into the grossly propagandistic view that in Auschwitz, in order to dispose of corpses, one had to kill people. The reality, which sheds light on the real reason for the experiment carried out by Prüfer, is that by 25 March, several hundred corpses of registered inmates who had died a “natural death” had accumulated. Therefore, if there were “so many corpses to be cremated,” it was precisely these.

In this context, we do well to recall the 20-March request by the SS garrison physician for “2 covered handcarts” to transport 50 corpses each to the crematorium. We can infer from this that from 21 to 25 March 1943, 500 corpses were brought there.

The Topf engineers misrepresented this reality, like almost all others, to pander to the wishes of those who interrogated them.

The story of the multiple-corpse cremations, like that of the “gas chambers,” was yet another one of Schultze’s and Prüfer’s concessions to Soviet propaganda, as contradictory as all the others. This also includes the story of people burned alive in furnaces, in the face of which the Topf engineers took different attitudes. Prüfer rejected it:²²⁹

Question: Did Willi Wiemokli talk to you about the fact that living people were burned in the furnaces of the crematorium?

Answer: Yes, there was such a conversation in recent times [presumably: at the end of the time when the camp existed], but I remember telling him at the time that this could not be true because the furnaces were too small.

The gist of the answer was that, since the door frames of the muffles were 60 cm × 60 cm in size, it was at least arduous to put a living, struggling person into them, with the muffle at 800°C.

Braun, on the other hand, accepted this claim without objection, although he admitted that he had learned it only from Allied propaganda in the immediate postwar period:²³⁰

“Question: Did you know that innocent people were exterminated and burned alive in the crematoria you built in the concentration camps?”

Answer: I only found out about this after Germany’s capitulation through the radio and newspapers.

Question: Did Prüfer and Schultze know about the above?

Answer: I assume that Prüfer and Schultze, who were in the concentration camps, knew that people were being exterminated and burned alive in the concentration-camp crematoria they had constructed.”

“Question: Were Prüfer and Schultze aware that living people were being exterminated in the crematoria?”

*Answer: In my opinion, they were informed.”*²³¹

Braun slipped another sliver of truth when he asserted:²³²

“The cremation furnaces manufactured by the Topf Company were delivered to the Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Dachau camps during the German-Soviet War, where, as I later learned from newspapers, Russian prisoners of war, prisoners of war from other nations, and civilians were exterminated.” (Emphasis added)

10. Conclusions

The Topf engineers pleaded guilty to the charges ascribed to them, but these charges were double-faceted: some aspects were real, some imaginary.

The real aspects were the objective and indisputable fact that Prüfer had designed the cremation furnaces installed at Auschwitz and Birkenau, and had directed their construction; that Schultze had designed the ventilation systems of Crematorium I, II and III; and that Sander and Braun were responsible for them by virtue of their management functions in the Topf Company.

The imaginary aspects – those that were actually incriminating – consisted of the claim that the ventilation systems of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III had been designed for a homicidal gas chamber, and that the crematoria were used to cremate the corpses of the gassing victims, and that the four engineers were fully aware of this.

In Chapter 5, I documented that, already by March-April 1945, this propaganda hypothesis had turned into an unquestionable dogma, so that recognition of the actual fact – the Topf engineers' activities at Auschwitz and Birkenau – necessarily implied recognition of the propaganda dogma. This is the meaning of the “confessions” of Kurt Prüfer, Karl Schultze, Fritz Sander and Gustav Braun: since they could neither deny nor downplay their actual involvement in the design and construction of cremation furnaces and ventilation systems for the crematoria at Auschwitz and Birkenau, they were forced to take on the burden of the purely propagandistic indictment: the mass extermination of – not Jews, who, to tell the truth, were never mentioned as having been the main victims during their interrogations; in fact, the Soviet investigators always spoke merely of “men, women and children.” That the Topf engineers knew nothing from personal experience of such an extermination and the use of the crematoria to carry it out is evident from their pertinent puerile, contradictory and false statements. But while trying in every way to please the Soviet investigators in the hope of having their lives saved, they sometimes, unwittingly, uttered flashes of truth in this context that were completely at odds with Soviet propaganda.

Even in the most-recent, refined versions as published by Jean-Claude Pressac and Robert Jan van Pelt, such propaganda collapses like a house of cards upon documented and systematic analysis (see Mattogno 2019; 2020). After this, not even a paltry hint of guilt remains standing against the Topf engineers.

For these reasons, they cannot be considered criminals who collaborated in making the Auschwitz “extermination machine” efficient, especially since they carried out their activities exclusively in the field of sanitation. Therefore, they all deserve a full and complete legal rehabilitation.

11. Annegret Schüle and the Topf Engineers

11.1. Uncritical Method

Annegret Schüle is considered one of the world’s leading experts on the company J.A. Topf und Söhne. She began working on the subject in 2002, helping to organize the exhibition “Technicians of the ‘final solution.’ Topf und Söhne – The Builders of the Auschwitz Furnaces,” which was opened at the Jewish Museum Berlin on 19 June 2005.²³³ By that route, she has been afforded the great fortune of having had access to a substantial body of documents, largely from Jean-Claude Pressac’s bequest to the Buchenwald Memorial and the main Thuringian archives in Weimar, but her unique merit is that she has published many of them.

In my review of her book on the Topf Company, I will focus particularly on her statements that have direct or indirect relevance to the interrogations of the Topf engineers and their activities at Auschwitz.

Following in the footsteps of Pressac’s theses, and deviating from them at times only to succumb to even more inconsistent interpretations, she flaunts the typical technical ignorance and gullibility of orthodox Holocaust historians. Schüle provides an example of this as early as in her first chapter, where she reports a technical drawing by Topf with the following caption: “Schematic diagram of an aeration-disaeration system, undated” (p. 40). The drawing shows two pairs of rooms, and each pair, intercommunicating, has a quadrangular opening in the ceiling: from the one in the room on the left (marked with No. 1) warm air comes out, in the one in the room on the right (bearing No. 2) moist air comes out. The openings in the four rooms feed into an air-extraction duct that runs above the rooms and is connected to an external suction blower located to the left of the rooms. To the right is a furnace to heat air. In each room, just above the floor, two beams support a wire-mesh-like grille. In Room 1, hot air coming out of the opening in the ceiling passes through this grille from top to bottom, and from bottom to top in Room 2, where it is drawn in through the corresponding opening in the ceiling.

I have dwelt on this incredible misunderstanding because, as I shall show later, Schüle attributes disproportionate importance to the aeration and disaeration system of Morgue #1 of Birkenau Crematoria II and III in terms of having had a homicidal function. Like other innocuous terms, such as “special facility,” she interprets this term according to the tenets of the orthodox Holocaust mythology of a “code language.”

The author’s credulity and lack of critical sense also results from her use of nonsensical testimony, as in this case (p. 153):

“Burning a person alive in a Topf furnace was the exception in Buchenwald. In Auschwitz, on the other hand, it was part of the punishment for the Sonderkommando inmates deployed in the crematoria.”

The sources are the self-declared eyewitnesses Filip Müller and Henryk Tauber!²³⁴ Her excursus on the Sonderkommando uprising, which covers six pages of text, is all based exclusively on testimonies, without the mention of a single document (pp. 221-227).

In her “Excursus: Auschwitz – from concentration camp to extermination camp,” Schüle cites the passage from Prüfer’s interrogation of 4 March 1948 concerning the alleged gas chamber in Crematorium I and the phantom gassings in Łódź (see Chapter 7.1.). Here is her commentary (p. 156):

“Even if geographical and technical details in this report are incorrect [...], his statement clearly proves that Prüfer already knew about the gas mass murder and its practice in Auschwitz in the spring of 1942.”

To an incredible lack of critical sense, she thus associates a hyperbolic and nonsensical emphasis: from the alleged observation of “more than ten” corpses, she deduces that Prüfer was aware of a “gas mass murder”!

11.2. Fritz Sander’s Mass-Cremation Furnace

On Fritz Sander’s “Continuously operating corpse-cremation furnace for mass use,” the author notes that in the relevant draft “cremation objects” are referred to as if they were “animal carcasses or garbage” (p. 169), ignoring the fact that this was the common technical term for corpse in all patents. For example, in the Volckmann-Ludwig crematorium patent issued on 30 October 1928, the corpse is precisely referred to as the “cremation object.”²³⁵ Oddly enough, the author quotes a short excerpt from this patent (p. 58, Note 193), so her accusation is incomprehensible.

²³⁴ See in this regard Mattogno 2021a and 2022.

Schüle then writes, again in relation to this project, that

“with a total building height of approx. 18 meters, 50 corpses could be cremated there every hour, hence 1,200 corpses per day.”

Her reference is to an “expert report by Rolf Decker, managing director and sales manager for incineration systems at the Ruppman Company in Stuttgart,... written down by publisher Klaus Kunz” and dated 25 April 1985 (p. 172, Note 71).

This is a two-page typescript signed precisely by Klaus Kunz.²³⁶ As I have explained elsewhere,²³⁷ Decker’s calculation is based on the assumption that each of the three chutes of the furnace was 25 meters long and could hold 50 corpses at a time, and that the process of vaporizing the corpses’ water took 15 minutes. This would correspond to “a cremation capacity of about 4,800 corpses in 24 hours,” and that the temperature at the height of the second chute was 1,000°C. From where Schüle derived the figure of 1,200 corpses daily is unknown. It probably stems from the misinterpretation of Decker’s data, because the figure she adduced results from $50 \text{ corpses/h} \times 24 \text{ h/day}$, that is, from the assumption of a duration of the cremation process of one hour, whereas Decker speaks of 15 minutes.

I also found that the expert’s assumptions are all unfounded. If the three inclined planes of the furnace were 25 meters long, the furnace would be at least 100 meters high (not 18, as Schüle claims) and 40 meters wide! Moreover, a duration of the corpse-drying process of 15 minutes is contrary to practical experience, which points at some 30 minutes. Finally, the assumption of a temperature of 1,000°C in such a furnace is completely illusory, both because of the enormous amount of heat required for the vaporization of the corpse water, and because of the inevitably huge excess of air streaming through such a huge, continuously fed device. The actual capacity of a realistic facility (some 6 meters high, as Pressac correctly estimated) would be about 360 corpses within 24 hours, which is the theoretical capacity of a triple-muffle furnace, but with the added convenience of continuous operation.

²³⁷ Mattogno 2019, pp. 405-406. In Mattogno 2020, pp. 46-58, I have quoted the full text of Decker’s expert report, my related technical analysis, and an examination of the technical drawbacks of the Sander furnace.

Schüle adds (p. 172):

“After heating up for a maximum of two days, the furnace could have been kept in operation without additional fuel.”

Such a claim is technical nonsense, because any realistic device would have had enormous radiation and combustion-heat losses due to its size, and would have worked with an even more enormous excess of air because of the very large disproportion between the volume of the combustion chamber and the volume of corpses to be cremated.

The absurdity of this claim becomes even clearer when comparing it with the Topf double-muffle furnace at the Gusen crematorium (originally a mobile oil-fired furnace). From 31 October to 13 November 1941, 677 corpses were cremated in this device, an average of 52 per day (26 per muffle), with an average continuous operation of about 18 hours per day. The furnace was thus practically always in a state of thermal equilibrium. Hence, according to the above fantasy, the corpses should have burned by themselves, and in fact should have added heat to the device. In reality, however, the average consumption of coke was 30.6 kg per cremation (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 362f.).

Schüle evidently misunderstood the following statement by Sander made during the interrogation of 7 March 1946: “The corpses themselves were to serve as an additional source of fuel”; the adjective “additional” in fact means that the furnace still required regular fuel.

11.3. The “Annular Incineration Furnace”

In a chapter on the “Annular Incineration Furnace,” Schüle sets forth further unfounded assumptions.

This facility is mentioned in Topf’s letter to the Central Construction Office dated 5 February 1943:²³⁸

“You will receive the cost estimate for the large annular incineration furnace on Tuesday of next week at the latest. In case a purchase is planned, we kindly ask for an order to be placed soonest to enable us to order the cast-iron and wrought-iron parts right away or start with their fabrication [ourselves].”

Although she knows that, technically speaking, an “annular furnaces” was a circular or ring furnace for firing bricks, and she even publishes a beautiful drawing of its horizontal and vertical section, from which it is clear that the ring consisted of a circular tunnel of refractory bricks (p. 175), Schüle incredibly confuses it with the design of the “sixth crematorium” mentioned in Bischoff’s letter to the camp commandant dated 12 February

²³⁸ APMO, BW AuII 30/4/34, D-Z-Bau/2544/2 (illegible page number).

1943, and elaborated on by Prüfer. This device was characterized as “an open cremation chamber with external dimensions 48.75 x 3.76 m” and an “open cremation site” (p. 173; document on p. 455). It is not clear how Schüle could believe that an “open cremation site” can have any relation to a ring furnace, whose indispensable prerequisite of operation is that the ring, meaning the firing chamber, is closed. Apparently, for her, the adjective “open” means that the alleged “annular furnace” had to be built in the open (p. 174):

“The annular furnace planned at the beginning of 1943 was probably to be set up outdoors, as indicated by the ‘open cremation site’.”

This is a very unique observation, given that any annular furnace, by its very structure, was designed and built outdoors.

Schüle rightly says that nothing is known about this facility, other than what is said about it in the aforementioned letter:

“It is not known how this annular furnace was supposed to function when burning human corpses.”

But soon afterwards, she ventures imaginative explanations (ibid.):

“In any case, as with the original annular furnace, the coal could only have been thrown in from above, and would then have been spread directly over the burning piles of corpses.”

In contradiction to this assumption, she reports a statement by Rudolf Höss that the facility had “the shape of a huge brickworks with a ring kiln” and was to be placed “below the ground” (ibid.), which does not reconcile with either an “open,” or an “open-air” facility.

Even more imaginatively, Schüle states (pp. 175f.):

“In 1944, the plans were changed to an underground facility, presumably to make it more difficult for Allied aircraft to discover it, and to save construction materials.”

Of course, she does not cite any sources to support this nonsense. It is obvious that the “Allied aircraft” would have very easily discovered the crematoria and the alleged, huge “cremation pits” in operation, so why would the camp SS have hidden this other (alleged) cremation plant?

With further confusion, the author then attributes the design of a mass-cremation plant that appears in a “cost estimate of the Topf Company for an incineration furnace” dated 1 April 1943 (p. 339; of which Raimund Schnabel quotes only the last page, and which she reproduces in facsimile). It refers to the design of an “open cremation chamber,” asserting that its construction required 19,000 bricks and cost RM 25,148, as precisely stated in the above quotation. In fact, this included “1 wrought-iron smoke duct damper with pulleys, wire rope and hand winch,” but this presupposes the presence of a smoke duct and thus a chimney, elements evidently incompatible with an “open cremation site.” The estimate in question therefore most likely referred to Sander’s project, which also had only one smoke duct. It is thus clear that Schüle understood little or nothing of the whole affair, as of many others.

The explanation I gave in my book on Auschwitz cremation furnaces, namely that the design was inspired by Friedrich Siemens’s “Field Furnace for the Cremation of Corpses,” no doubt known to Prüfer, still makes the most sense.²³⁹

11.4. Air-Intake and -Extraction Systems

Schüle then quotes Item 3 of the file memo written by SS Untersturmführer Fritz Ertl on 21 August 1942 (p. 182):

“With regard to the construction of a 2nd crematorium with five triple-muffle furnaces, as well as air-intake and -extraction systems, the result of the ongoing negotiations with the Reich Security Main Office regarding the allocation of quotas must first be awaited.”

And here is her comment on this (ibid.):

“The fact that air-extraction systems were planned for the furnace, mortuary and dissection rooms of a crematorium resulted from the function of the rooms. So why were the ‘air-intake and -extraction systems’ mentioned separately? Probably because they provided the ideal technical conditions for turning one of the basement rooms in each of the identical Crematoria II and III into underground gas chambers.”

This comment reveals a startling historical-technical ignorance. To begin with, Schüle misrepresents the real meaning of the reference to air-intake and -extraction system (plural), which is this: the equipment for Crematorium II as ordered from the Topf Company concerned two cost estimates: the first was for the five triple-muffle furnaces, with appendices and related items, which has been mentioned several times. It was described in Topf’s letter to the Construction Office Auschwitz dated 4 November 1941, and confirmed with Invoice No. 69 dated 27 January 1943.²⁴⁰ The other estimate concerned the ventilation systems. The latter, drafted likewise on 4 November 1941, was titled “Cost estimate for air-intake and extraction system.” It included:²⁴¹

A. air-intake system for the “B” Room (= Morgue #1) with a pressure blower and a fresh-air intake pipe;

²³⁹ Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 146f., 291; Vol. II, Doc. 93, p. 130.

²⁴⁰ RGVA, 502-2-26, pp. 230-230a.

²⁴¹ RGVA, 502-1-327, pp. 151-157.

- B. air-extraction system for the “B” Room (= Morgue #1) with a suction blower and an exhaust-air pipe;
- C. air-extraction system for the furnace room with a suction blower;
- D. air-extraction system for the dissecting, laying-out and washroom, with a suction blower and an exhaust-air pipe;
- E. air-extraction system for the “L” Room (= Morgue #2), with a suction blower and an exhaust-air pipe.

In practice, the construction of the future Crematorium II consisted of the five triple-muffle furnaces “as well as” the ventilation systems, so that it makes no sense to say that these were mentioned “separately” for ulterior motives.

All of these facilities, which were confirmed with Topf Invoice No. 171 of 22 February 1943,²⁴² were thus part of the equipment of Crematorium II. Because some of their components were made of metal, the project required the “allocation of [metal] quotas” exceeding those needed for the cremation furnaces.

As for the almost superstitious meaning of criminal intent that Schüle ascribes to the ventilation systems (but she does not even question the reason for the use of the plural) – as if they were installations necessarily connected to a homicidal gas chamber – two complementary considerations must be made. First, in any crematorium, corpse-storage rooms were ventilated. As early as 1905, engineer Wilhelm Heepke prescribed (Heepke, p. 104):

“Strong ventilation is also important in morgues in order to hold back the corpses’ putrefaction processes as much as possible. Here too, air extraction is more important than air intake. The corpses or coffins should not be laid directly on the floor, but should be placed hollow on trestles above the floor so that the air beneath the corpses can be drawn out of the room. Fresh air is supplied from above. At least a five-fold hourly air exchange is to be expected here; under certain circumstances, if the room is heavily used, this can even be increased to 10 times, which is achieved with the help of a ventilator.”

The recommendation regarding the preference of air extraction over air intake simply means that removing of stale and contaminated air is more important in a morgue than the supply of fresh air.

But it is clear – and here comes the second consideration – that air extraction is possible only if air intake is provided for at the same time. Therefore, an air-extraction system is always an air-intake and -extraction system, or else the air-extraction would create a vacuum. The only difference is that the air intake can be mechanical – and in that case the expression air-intake and -extraction system is properly used – or natural, by means of simple ventilation openings or windows. Then we speak more properly of an air-extraction system. However, in both cases, an extraction fan is present.

That being said, it makes no sense to link an air-intake and -extraction system to a homicidal gas chamber, as if it could only serve this purpose, and a mere air-extraction system to an ordinary morgue. From an orthodox point of view, a room with mere air extraction would have functioned as a homicidal gas chamber just as well as a room equipped with air-intake and -extraction blowers. Indeed, as I pointed out in Chapter 8.3., the ventilation system of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II/III, which had an intake and an extraction fan, allowed for 9.5 air exchanges per hour, while the system of Morgue #2, which only had an extraction fan, had 11 air exchanges per hour. Therefore, in spite of being equipped with only an air-extraction fan, this room would have been even more suitable as a homicidal gas chamber!

11.5. Crematoria IV and V and the “Bunkers” of Birkenau

Schüle goes on to state that, in Ertl’s file memo of 21 August 1942, the future Crematoria IV and V were “planned in connection with the gas murders in Bunkers 1 and 2” (p. 182), a completely unfounded assertion, as I have already mentioned in Chapter 7.2. By the way, here she misses an excellent opportunity to mention and discuss Prüfer’s related statement on the “Bathing establishments for special operations” that I reviewed earlier.

Schüle explains in another context that “the two initially planned, simplified 3-muffle furnaces” were meant to be erected “at the Birkenau bunkers” (Note 61, p. 169). Clarification is needed here. These furnaces, of a simplified structure in the sense that they had only one gas generator placed behind the central muffle, and only one common smoke duct,²⁴³ are described in Topf’s estimate of 12 February 1942. They were originally planned for a small makeshift crematorium to be built inside the Birkenau Camp. However, on 27 February 1942, it was decided to move the new crematorium (the latter Crematorium II), which had been planned originally for the Auschwitz Main Camp, to Birkenau instead. For this reason, the makeshift crematorium with its two separate, primitive furnaces became ²⁴³ Mattoigno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 278-280 (translation of the estimate dated 12 February 1942); Vol. II, Doc. 228, pp. 384-386 (reproduction of the estimate), Docs. 229 a-c, pp. 387f. (schematic drawings).

“superfluous.” The matter is set out in Bischoff’s letter to Kammler dated 30 March 1942.²⁴⁴ Since Topf had drawn up the relevant plans already, it asked the Central Construction Office for reimbursement of RM 1,769.36. In order to avoid having to pay this amount unnecessarily, the Central Construction Office decided to purchase the project anyway. On 8 April, Bischoff notified Topf:²⁴⁵

“The two large triple-muffle cremation furnaces originally planned for the PoW Camp Auschwitz will be switched to another construction project. [...] Further details about the new construction project will be communicated.”

On 15 April, Bischoff forwarded to Office group C III/1 of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office the invoice from Topf No. 396 dated 17 March for the above-mentioned RM 1,769.36 with a request to initiate its payment.²⁴⁶ From this time on, all traces of the two furnaces are lost. They reappear in Ertl’s file memo of 21 August 1942 as “installation of 2 three-muffle furnaces each at the ‘bathing establishments for special operations’” (see Chapter 7.2.). This expression presupposes a preliminary discussion at the Central Construction Office about “bathing establishments for special operations,” but there is no trace of this in the existing documentation. On the other hand, since only two furnaces were purchased by the Central Construction Office, it is not clear how two could be installed at each “bathing establishment” (these establishments had to be at least two, in which case at least four furnaces would have been required). I will return to this question in Chapter 11.9.

11.6. The Crematorium II Furnace Tests

In connection with the commissioning of Crematorium II and, specifically, the testing of the cremation furnaces, Schüle refers to Henryk Tauber’s nonsensical statements, and adds that “Kurt Prüfer and probably Karl Schultze” were present (p. 204). In her chronology at the end of her book, she reiterates with reference to the 5th of March 1943: “Cremation test of corpses in Crematorium II in the presence of Prüfer.” (p. 382)

Her statement is astonishing, because Prüfer explicitly denied that he participated in the testing.²⁴⁷

²⁴⁴ RGVA, 502-1-313, p. 174.

²⁴⁵ RGVA, 502-1-313, p. 173.

²⁴⁶ RGVA, 502-1-313, p. 171.

²⁴⁷ Protocol of the interrogation of K. Prüfer dated 9 March 1948.

“Question: Did you personally take part in the testing of the cremation furnaces and the commissioning of the crematoria built under your leadership in Auschwitz?”

Answer: I did not have to take part in the testing of the cremation furnaces, or the commissioning of the crematoria built under my leadership in Auschwitz. This was done by fitters from the company who carried out the construction and assembly work in these crematoria under my supervision.”

Furthermore, Prüfer’s participation in the test is not reflected in any documents. Therefore, this is nothing more than Schüle’s fantasy.

She also confuses the furnace test without forced-draft systems of 24-25 March 1943 with the actual testing of the furnaces themselves. What is more, she writes that Schultze stayed in Auschwitz from 1 to 13 March 1943, but her date of Prüfer’s return is at odds with the engineer’s statements that he left Auschwitz on 6 March. She moreover states that Prüfer told his Soviet interrogators “on the commissioning of the gas chamber in the second [March] week, and the cremation of the inmates killed there, but not on the first cremation” (p. 204, Notes 179), while Prüfer actually spoke contradictorily about both events.

Schüle then pretends not to have noticed the jarring contrast between Schultze’s and Tauber’s statements about the first test cremation. I reiterate what I have already noted in Chapter 7.3. On 3 March, Schultze tested “the ventilation equipment in the gas chamber” and was convinced that it “was working flawlessly.” Then Schultze also tested the “blower,” but Bischoff told him that it “had to be checked when cremating corpses in the furnaces,” which had never yet been used. On 6 March, a transport of 150 to 300 inmates arrived who were killed in the “gas chamber” of Crematorium II, so that Schultze and Bischoff could finally check together “the operation, more precisely the operation during the activity, of both the blower and the ventilation systems in the gas chamber.” Tauber, however, reported:²⁴⁸

“On 4 March [1943], we were in charge of firing up the gas generators. We kept them going from morning until 4 o’clock in the afternoon. In the meantime, a commission from the Political Department and senior SS officers from Berlin arrived at the crematorium. In addition to them, there were also civilians and engineers from the ‘Topf’ Company. Of the members of this committee I remember Hauptsturmführer Schwarz, Camp Commandant Aumeyer [Aumeier] and Oberscharführer Kwakernak [Quakernack]. After the arrival of the commission, we were ordered to bring out corpses from the auxiliary room^[249] and to throw them [sic] into the muffles. In the auxiliary room, we then found about 45 corpses of only men, very well fed and fat. At that time, I did not know when these corpses had been deposited in the auxiliary room, and from where they had been taken. But then I learned that they had been selected from the people gassed at Bunker No. II, located in the woods. In fact, an officer from the Political Department had gone there [and] had ordered to select from the corpses of the gassed persons the corpses of well-developed and fat people, [then] had commanded to take these corpses away from the bunker area on a truck. The Sonderkommando inmates who were employed there did not know where these corpses had been taken. It turned out that they were used to test the efficiency of Crematorium No. II, which was to be put into operation at that time, and to demonstrate it to the many-member commission.”

Therefore, the corpses used to test the crematoria – 45, not 60 – had been “gassed” in “Bunker 2,” not in the “gas chamber” of Crematorium II, and the peculiar thing is that the reference to “Bunker II” also appears in Schüle’s relevant quotation! (p. 204). Here one has to choose: either one lends credence to Schultze’s version or to Tauber’s (or to neither).

The author adds that Prüfer, after the testing of the furnaces (during which he was not present), advised “to maintain the fire in the empty furnaces for several days in order to dry them out properly, which the SS then actually implemented” (ibid.). This is a real absurdity. In his letter to Kammler dated 29 January 1943, Bischoff wrote instead:²⁵⁰

“The furnaces were fired up in the presence of Chief Engineer Prüfer from the contractor, Topf & Sons, Erfurt, and are working perfectly.”

And Prüfer confirmed this in his report prepared the same day:²⁵¹

“The five triple-muffle cremation furnaces are ready and are currently being dry-heated.”

The drying of the furnaces thus began at the end of January. Therefore, by the beginning of March it had been completed (the process generally took several weeks; Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 43f.). Consequently, leaving the crematoria in operation for ten consecutive days, as Tauber asserted, would have provided no benefit, quite to the contrary: it would only have resulted in the waste of at least 42 tons of coke (Mattogno 2019, pp. 348-350; Mattogno 2022, pp. 87-89).

At this point, it is important to point out that orthodox Holocaust historiography practically ignores altogether the corpses of registered inmates who perished of “natural” deaths. That deficiency was even confirmed by ²⁴⁹ The auxiliary corpse-storage room.

²⁵¹ APMO, BW 30/34, p. 101.

Robert Jan van Pelt with his aforementioned statement that “Auschwitz had virtually no permanently dedicated morgue capacity” in the crematoria.

In the specific case of Crematorium II, after the facilities were tested on 5 March 1943,²⁵² with corpses of gassing victims according to the prevailing orthodox narrative, the furnaces were fired idly until 13 March, and on the 14th they were used to cremate the allegedly gassing victims of the deportees arriving from Krakow Ghetto. But what happened with the deceased registered inmates? In January 1943, these numbered about 4,500, in February about 7,600, and in March about 4,500 (Mattogno 2023a, p. 193). Where and how were these 16,600 corpses disposed of?

The absurdity of the orthodox Holocaust reconstruction is also evident from the documents. Regarding the coke consumption by the Topf cremation furnaces, the only document, experimental and incontrovertible, is the list of cremations performed in the cremation furnace at Gusen Camp. As I mentioned earlier, from 31 October to 13 November 1941, 677 corpses were cremated in this furnace, an average of 52 per day (26 per muffle), with an average continuous operation of about 18 hours per day, and an average coke consumption of 30.6 kg per corpse (Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 301-306, 362-365). This, I repeat, is an experimental fact.

If we now consider the letter from the Central Construction Office dated 28 June 1943, it appears that Crematoria II and III could each cremate 1,440 corpses in 24 hours.²⁵³ Finally, the file memo by civilian employee Rudolf Jährling dated 17 March 1943 establishes (based on Topf data) that the 10 gas generators of five triple-muffle furnaces consumed 350 kg of coke per hour, but only 2/3 of this during continuous operation, or 5,600 kg in 24 hours.²⁵⁴ Thus, if we were to take the letter of 28 June seriously, it would follow that the coke consumption per corpse would have been $(5,600 \text{ kg} \div 1,440 =) 3.9 \text{ kg}$! This is blatantly at odds with the actual consumption of the Gusen furnace: 30.6 kg per corpse. How can this contradiction be explained? Not to mention the absurd cremation capacity accepted as real by Schüle: 8,000 corpses per day (see Chapter 11.7.). In that case, the coke consumption would have been $(5,600 \text{ kg} \div 8,000 =) 0.7 \text{ kg}$ per corpse!

The only attempt by an orthodox historian to explain this with some wild gyrations was ventured by Robert Jan van Pelt during David Irving's libel trial against Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher Penguin Books, which took place between January and April 2000. Van Pelt argued that the difference in consumption between the 35 kilograms of coke per corpse in the Gusen furnace and the claimed 3.5 kilograms in the Birkenau furnaces (according to the erroneous data assumed in the trial) depended on the preheating of the Auschwitz furnaces as opposed to the Gusen furnace.²⁵⁵ However, in his mind-boggling historical-documentary and technical ignorance, van Pelt did not know what he was saying.²⁵⁶ In fact, the coke consumption of the Gusen furnace referred to an 18-hour-a-day operation. Because of their system of operation, coke furnaces could not run continuously 24 hours a day, but required a daily interruption of some of 3-4 hours for cleaning the hearth grates. Furthermore, Jährling's file memo of 17 March 1943 explicitly refers to a "continuous operation" of the furnaces "during 12 hours" a day, which was considered "one day's activity." It follows that the Gusen furnace's coke consumption of 30.6 kilograms is lower than that considered for Auschwitz, since the Gusen furnace did not run for 12 hours a day, like the Auschwitz furnaces, but for 18 hours a day. Inversely, for a lower consecutive number of cremations and thus a shorter duration of operation, the Gusen furnace consumed a greater amount of coke than 30.6 kg, even significantly more: Thus, the 193 corpses that were cremated from 26 September to 15 October, averaging only 10 per day, required 9,180 kg of coke, averaging 47.5 kg per corpse; the 129 corpses cremated from 26 to 30 October, averaging 32 per day, required 4,800 kg, averaging 37.2 kg per corpse.²⁵⁷ It should be noted that, in this Gusen furnace, the cremation of 32 corpses per day, 16 per muffle, corresponded to an activity of about 11 hours, so that the benchmark for the furnaces at Birkenau Crematorium II in the case of a continuous operation of 12 hours per day, based on the documents, would be a consumption of around 35-36 kg of coke per corpse.

²⁵² This should be 3 or 4 March; see Tauber's statement in Mattogno 2022, pp. 87: “On 4 March [1943], we were in charge of firing up the gas generators.”

This makes it clear that the 1/3 reduction in coke consumption during continuous operation of 12 hours per day (as compared to a few hours' operation per day) should not be understood in the sense that the amount of coke burned in the gas generators decreased by 1/3, i.e., dropped from 35 to 23.3 kg/h, but in the sense that it remained more or less unchanged. What did decrease significantly was the duration it took to preheat the ²⁵⁵ See his statements and my related discussion in Mattogno 2019, pp. 405-412.

²⁵⁶ I have documented the incredible incompetence of this alleged expert in Mattogno 2020, in particular in Chapter 15, pp. 145-159.

²⁵⁷ Ibid., p. 414, table showing the consumption of the Gusen furnace at various periods of operation; see also Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 363 cooled-down furnaces back up to operating temperature. As the case of the Gusen furnace shows experimentally, going from 5 to 26 consecutive cremations per muffle resulted in coke savings of $(30.5 \div 47.5 =) 64.2\%$, corresponding to roughly $2/3 (= 66.7\%)$.

From the above it is clear that idle operation of the five triple-muffle furnaces of Crematorium II, even for only 12 hours a day, or for 10 days as stated by Tauber (starting on 5 March, as Schüle claimed),²⁵⁸ would have resulted in a wasted coke consumption of $(350 \text{ kg/h} \times 12 \text{ h/day} \times 10 \text{ days} =) 42,000 \text{ kg}$ of coke. Yet during the period in question (3-13 March), only 25.5 tons of coke were delivered to Crematoria I and II.²⁵⁹

Having established based on documents that the coke consumption for the cremation of an adult corpse was 30.6 kilograms, the issue of Crematorium II's activity in March 1943 can be taken up again.

As I have already noted, 8,328 people were reportedly gassed there between 14 and 24 March 1943.

It is documented that Crematoria I and II received a total of 70 tons of coke between 13 and 24 March 1943,²⁶⁰ enough to cremate $(70,000 \div 30.6 =)$ about 2,300 corpses. One can also assume that, from the orthodox point of view, there were numerous children among the 8,328 alleged gassing victims. But even if we assume that about 31 percent of all victims were children,²⁶¹ and that four children were equivalent to one adult, they would still correspond to about $(8,328 \times 0.31 \div 4 =)$ 645 adults, and the equivalent figure would be about $[8,328 \times 0.69 + 645 =]$ about 6,400 adults. On the other hand, one must also consider the camp's "natural" mortality.

Over 1,800 inmates died between 13 and 23 March,²⁶² so the total number of corpses would have been $(6,400 + 1,800 =)$ 8,200, and the coke consumption would have been $(70,000 \div 8,200 =)$ 8.5 kg per corpse. If, on the other hand, only the actual documented deaths are considered, the consumption was $(70,000 \div 1,800 =)$ about 39 kg of coke per corpse, an amount that falls well within the experimental parameters of the Gusen furnace.

²⁵⁸ But it should have started on 3 March and lasted until 13 March, if the first "gassing" occurred on 14 March. Tauber spoke instead of 4 March.

²⁵⁹ "Koks i węgiel dla krematoriów w tonach" ("Coke and coal for crematoria in tons"). APMO, D-AuI-4.

²⁶⁰ Ibid. There were no coke deliveries on the 14th.

²⁶¹ Kubica, p. 350. The figure refers to Polish Jews.

²⁶² Mattogno 2023a, p. 193. The mortality on 23 March (29 deaths) is partial; the remaining deaths were recorded (also under 23 March) in Death Book 12/43, which has not been preserved. The deaths on 23 March were in the range of 70-80. The mortality on 24 March is unknown.

The theoretical minimum coke consumption of the triple-muffle furnace, with continuous operation, actually averaged about 20 kg (that of the double-muffle furnace about 28 kg; Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, p. 375), but even this would have made it impossible to cremate the real corpses plus the fictitious ones of the alleged gassings.²⁶³

This goes to show that orthodox Holocaust historians are not only completely ignorant of the issues surrounding the Auschwitz crematoria in relation to the alleged gassings, but they also disregard documents from which, even without special expertise and on the basis of simple calculations, it irrefutably results that their conjectures about the duration of cremations and their coke consumption are completely unfounded.

11.7. The Furnaces' Cremation Capacity

In dealing with the issue of crematorium capacity, Schüle relies mainly on the nonsensical statements of Henryk Tauber. Starting from the absurd assumption of the cremation of three corpses per muffle in half an hour, she calculates "a maximum capacity of 2,160 corpses during a 24-hour operation period" (p. 205). By so doing, she overlooks that Tauber himself had declared a maximum operation of 21 hours per day, because of the interruption necessary for the removal of slag from the gas-generator hearths. Then Schüle considers Tauber's figure of 2,500 corpses in 24 hours for Crematoria II and III to be "realistic," although it contradicts her own assumptions. Next, she adds 1,500 corpses each for Crematoria IV and V according to Rudolf Höss's statements, and thus arrives at a maximum capacity of 8,000 corpses in 24 hours for all Birkenau crematoria (ibid.). This method can only be characterized as thermo-technical delusion. This figure, as I noted earlier, implies an absolutely ludicrous coke consumption of 0.7 kg per corpse.

Most interesting in her calculation is Schüle's silence about Prüfer and Schultze's statements on the cremation capacity of the triple-muffle cremation furnaces: one corpse in one muffle in one hour.²⁶⁴ This results in a theoretical maximum capacity of 1,104 corpses within 24 hours (966 when considering a 3-hour daily break for grate cleaning). How does she explain the statements of the two Topf engineers, and how does she reconcile them with Tauber's figure?

²⁶³ In fact, if they had all been cremated in Crematorium II, they would have required (6,900 corpses \times 19 kg/corpse =) 131,100 kg of coke, not including the initial heating of the five furnaces. However, since Crematorium I was also used regularly during the period in question, the average consumption would have increased to about 21 kilograms per corpse, which would have required (6,900 corpses \times 21 kg/corpse =) 144,900 kg of coke, against a supply of 68,000 kg.

Since the coke consumption of the two hearths of the triple-muffle furnace was two times 35 kg/h = 70 kg/h, it is also easy to calculate that the cremation of three corpses in one hour would have required ($70 \div 3 =$) 23.3 kg of coke.

Schüle thus had good reasons for omitting these important statements by the two Topf engineers.

Likewise, she is also silent about Prüfer's statements on the differences between civilian and concentration-camp cremation furnaces as laid out during his interrogation on 5 March 1943:

"In the civilian crematoria, a special bellows [actually a blower] is used to blow in preheated air, which causes the corpse to burn more quickly and without smoke. The construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps is different; it does not allow the air to be heated in advance, which is why the corpse burns more slowly and with smoke."

When considering that one of the best cremation furnaces built by the Topf Company, the electric furnace that was installed in the Erfurt crematorium in 1936, had reduced the cremation time from the 60-90 minutes or more for coke furnaces to just 50-70 minutes,²⁶⁵ and if taking into account the fact that corpses in concentration camp furnaces burned "more slowly," Schüle's silence seems even more understandable.

She also does not discuss how the fantastic cremation capacity she assumes reconciles with the statement by Dachau inmate Karl Kirschner, which she adduced herself: that "a cremation often lasted more than an hour" in the oil-fired Topf double-muffle furnace at Dachau (pp. 128f.; although it is unclear whether the witness referred to the original oil-fired device or to the one later converted to burn coke.)

11.8. Testing the Ventilation Systems of Crematorium II

In reference to Messing's assembly activity in Crematorium II during the first ten days of March 1943, Schüle states:

"Schultze's statement during the interrogation in Moscow that he had tested the 'ventilation systems in the gas chamber' on Wednesday of that week is consistent with Messing's labor time sheet. During this time, the fire in the empty furnaces was maintained, and on the same day, Schultze 'tested' the 'blower on the cremation furnaces,' meaning the forced-draft systems, which had evidently not been installed or used during the first experimental cremation of corpses at the beginning of March.”

²⁶⁵ Ibid., Unit I, Chapter 6. "The Duration of the Cremation Process," pp. 98-109.

In her footnote, Schüle reiterates that “according to his own statement, Schultze returned to Erfurt on Saturday, 13 March 1943” (p. 210, Note 194). These claims are all unfounded. First of all, as I have shown above, Schulze returned to Erfurt on 6 March, not on the 13th. Second, Messing put the aeration and deaeration system of Morgue #1 into operation on 13 March, when Schulze had left Auschwitz for a week: Third, in the interrogation of 11 March 1948, Schulze explicitly stated, “Likewise, I carried out the testing of the blower.” He claims that this took place on Wednesday, 3 March, but with idle furnaces. Bischoff then asked him to do another test during a cremation, and on the following Saturday, 6 March, he tested “the operation, more precisely the operation during the activity, of both the blower and the ventilation systems in the gas chamber” during an alleged homicidal gassing.

On the damage to the forced-draft devices, as a result of which Prüfer and Schulze were summoned to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March 1943, Schüle states that “this happened when the furnaces were in continuous operation for the second time, a few days after the first mass gas murder in Crematorium II on 13 March 1943” (Note 208, p. 214), but this is in open contrast to Kirschnek’s file memo of 25 March as quoted in Chapter 7.3., according to which the forced-draft devices had suffered damage “after the first full use.” If the first “gassing” took place on 14 March, how can it be explained that the first full use of the forced-draft devices took place only eight or nine days later?

11.9. The Interrogations of the Topf Engineers

Schüle’s chapter “The Interrogations of the Arrested Engineers by the Soviet Army,” though brief, is the most important part of her book from the perspective of the present study. Schüle writes (pp. 271f.):

“The interrogation protocols are key documents. Only there did the participants comment on the accusation of having supported the SS with technology for the mass extermination of human life. However, the protocols are also a problematic source for several reasons. On the one hand, this concerns their genesis. We do not know under what pressure the detainees were put, and whether the answers were recorded correctly, and we cannot rule out the possibility that errors were made when translating their statements into Russian. It is striking that none of the engineers Prüfer, Schultze and Sander, who were directly involved in furnace construction and ventilation technology, denied their work for the SS.”

I only observe that there is nothing surprising in the fact that the Topf engineers had admitted their “work for the SS,” because this was irrefutably established by the documents seized by the Soviets in Auschwitz and Erfurt, at the Topf Company’s headquarters. Indeed, for the reasons explained earlier, it is not surprising either that the engineers had confessed their direct or indirect participation in homicidal gassings.

Schüle then explains that Prüfer and Schultze “made false statements about details such as the time and frequency of visits to Auschwitz, the number of camps supplied, and the number of furnaces installed, as well as their incineration capacity.” (p. 272)

The allegedly “false statements” – only implied by Schüle – about the cremation capacity is Prüfer’s and Schultze’s statement that the triple-muffle furnaces could cremate one corpse per hour in each muffle, which, as noted earlier, is in blatant contrast to Schüle’s fanciful conjecture of a cremation capacity of 2,500 corpses for five triple-muffle furnaces, i.e., seven corpses per hour per muffle!

To dismiss this fundamental issue with a generic mention of an alleged “false statements” is therefore just a poor cop-out.

Schüle then discusses the issue of whether the Topf engineers rendered their confessions voluntarily or under duress and notes:

“No one could force Sander to emphasize his active part in this new development [of mass cremation] during the interrogation.”

She emphasizes the contradiction, which I pointed out earlier, regarding the dating of Sander’s knowledge of the alleged mass extermination at Auschwitz in relation to his plan for a new crematorium he set forth in his letter of 14 September 1942: in his interrogations of 2 and 13 March 1946, Sander said he was informed by Prüfer about mass extermination in the spring or summer of 1942, but the context he outlined necessarily points back to March 1943. Then Schüle continues (p. 273):

“For Jürgen Graf, author of the revisionist journal ‘Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung,’ this contradiction in Sander’s statements is proof that he was ‘forced to falsely incriminate himself and his long-time collaborators Prüfer and Schultze. In the case of Kurt Prüfer, the author even insinuated that he had been ‘mentally broken, if not brainwashed’ and had therefore given the answers expected of him.”

Before examining the meaning Schüle attaches to Graf’s statement, it is appropriate to show her commentary on Sander’s aforementioned contradiction (p. 274):

“The contradictions in Sander’s statements are not proof that the interrogation records were falsified, but they must be acknowledged and can no longer be resolved today. Perhaps the events of 1942 and 1943 became mixed up in Sander's memory, because he had frequent conversations with Prüfer about Auschwitz, and the new information became mixed up with the event that was particularly relevant to him, his patent application.

One does historical clarification no favors if one denies these contradictions by replacing the year 1942 with 1943 when quoting Sander's statement. This is how British historian and professor of German Gerald Fleming and, following him, the magazine Der Spiegel proceeded. [...] The re-dating of Sander's statement to the year 1943 is also nonsensical, because Sander's patent application of November 1942 was based precisely on the fact that he knew at that time about the high demand for corpse incineration capacities in Auschwitz and its cause."

It goes without saying that serious scholars are not content with merely dismissing an explanation of a contradiction by simply acknowledging the contradiction, even declaring it insoluble, yet without proposing an alternative explanation. It is quite useful to return to and elaborate further on the real meaning of the above-mentioned contradiction. The question is whether Sander was aware of mass exterminations at Auschwitz, for which the existing crematoria would have been insufficient, before 14 September 1942, so that he invented a new mass-cremation furnace specifically for such an alleged extermination. However, as shown earlier, this is impossible, because the orthodoxy insists that, until late September 1942, all victims of the claimed mass extermination at Auschwitz were buried in mass graves, not cremated.

It is a fact that Sander claimed to have known about mass extermination at Auschwitz in gas chambers with subsequent cremation of the corpses in crematoria, because during the interrogation of 7 March 1946 he stated that "in the concentration camps of Auschwitz many people were exterminated in gas chambers, and their corpses burned in crematoria." Therefore, if Sander can have learned of the alleged extermination from Prüfer and Schultze only in March 1943, his 1942 furnace invention could have had nothing to do with this alleged extermination. But then the claim that "no one could force Sander to emphasize his active part" in the alleged extermination process with the planning of a facility for the cremation of corpses from homicidal gas chambers must be examined in a different light: Sander told a deliberate lie that incriminated him in a very serious crime. Why would he have done this?

If Schüle is unable to account for the above contradiction and the problem related to Sander's false self-incrimination, she cannot sensibly criticize Graf and revisionist researchers for providing an answer she does not like.

The contradiction in question exists and remains insuperable only as long as one remains within the framework of the orthodox Holocaust narrative. If one considers the reality of documented facts, it vanishes.

Prüfer was in Auschwitz on 19 and 20 August 1942, to discuss cremation facilities to be built at Birkenau. By the beginning of July, the first cases of typhus had appeared at Birkenau.²⁶⁶ A virulent epidemic broke out later that month, forcing Höss to order a quarantine lockdown of the camp on 20 July.²⁶⁷ Mortality among inmates increased enormously: from about 4,400 in July to 8,600 in August. Beginning in the second week of the month, mortality, which, until 6 August, had remained at an average of just over 130 deaths per day, began to increase enormously, from over 170 on 7 August to over 300 on 11 August to over 400 on 15 August and to well over 500 on 19 August; from 1 to 19 August, there were over 5,000 deaths; the average from 10 to 19 August was about 370 deaths per day (Mattogno 2023a, p. 190). Ertl's file memo of 21 August 1942, and the related decisions it reports, should be considered in the framework of this tragic historical context.²⁶⁸

Seen from the orthodox Holocaust perspective, the Auschwitz camp administration's concerns about cremation capacities not only appears to be unfounded, but also contradictory. For if we follow the orthodox narrative, mass extermination allegedly began at Auschwitz in the so-called "bunkers" of Birkenau, which are said to have started operating (according to Pressac) at the end of May ("Bunker 1") and on 30 June 1942 ("Bunker 2"). One of the many contradictions of such an interpretation lies in the fact that the Auschwitz administration had planned a crematorium with five triple-muffle furnaces for the Birkenau "Prisoner-of-War Camp" merely for the "natural" mortality of the inmates:²⁶⁹

"The company Topf & Sons, furnace technology, Erfurt, has received an order from the local authorities to build an incineration plant as quickly as possible, as a prisoner-of-war camp has been attached to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, which will be occupied by around 120,000 Russians within a very short time. The construction of the cremation plant was therefore urgently needed to prevent epidemics and other dangers."

²⁶⁶ This had happened on 1 July in the camp section for civilian employees of the company Huta & Lenz. Bericht by the Central Construction Office dated 2 July 1942; RGVA, 502-1-332, p. 153.

²⁶⁷ Hausverfügung No. 40 dated 20 July 1942; RGVA, 502-1-25, p. 61.

²⁶⁸ On this tragic event and its aftermath, I dwell in Mattogno 2021b, pp. 46-95.

²⁶⁹ RGVA, 502-1-314, pp. 8-8a

For the alleged mass extermination, on the other hand, there was no provision for cremation. All victims are said to have been buried in mass graves. It is certainly true that the alleged victims of “gassings” are claimed to have increased from over 4,600 in July to over 36,000 in August, but since the corpses were being buried, there was no need to hold a meeting with Prüfer on 19 August to discuss the question of upgrading cremation capacities at Auschwitz.

That this meeting could not have been about the alleged extermination of Jews results precisely from the orthodoxy’s Holocaust claims.

Schüle claims that Himmler, during his visit to Auschwitz on 17 and 18 July 1942, “had experienced firsthand that an unbearable stench of decomposition hung over the Birkenau grounds,” so “he ordered the opening of the pits and the cremation of the corpses outdoors” (p. 158, emphasis added). This is highly implausible, because, according to Danuta Czech, this exhumation and cremation activity began on 21 September 1942 (1990, p. 242), after Rudolf Höss had allegedly inspected the “field furnaces” built by SS Standartenführer Paul Blobel in Chełmno on 16 September (ibid., p. 301; cf. Mattogno 2008; 2017, pp. 73-79, 92f.). The exhumation-cremation order would thus have arrived in Auschwitz a few days earlier. Indeed, one cannot seriously believe that Himmler’s possible order given on 17 or 18 July would have been carried out only two months later. The fact remains, however, that, seen from the orthodox Holocaust perspective, the crematoria at Birkenau, at this stage of the camp’s claimed history, could not concern at all the corpses of alleged gassing victims, for which open-air cremation was planned.²⁷⁰

In this context, the “installation of 2 three-muffle furnaces each at the ‘bathing establishments for special operations’” mentioned in Ertl’s file memo of 21 August 1942 creates more contradictions for the orthodoxy. If we assume for the sake of the argument, without conceding it, that this expression was indeed a “code word” for the two “bunkers” at Birkenau (although two furnaces for each “bunker,” as noted earlier, would have required the setup of four furnaces, while the Central Construction Office had paid only for two), then this would have represented on the one hand a late intervention. If cremation of the gas-chamber victims was considered rather than burial, these furnaces should have been installed near the two “bunkers” right when the latter were set up, meaning in May and late June 1942. However, since no such earlier cremation decision is claimed, the decision to install these furnaces was premature, because in August 1942 the order to no longer bury but exhume and burn the alleged victims of the homicidal gas chambers had not yet been issued. So here, too, the same basic contradiction pointed out above resurfaces.

Returning to Sander's furnace, on the day the Topf engineer set its design in writing, 14 September, Höss had not even (allegedly) gone to Chełmno, and since Sander had no doubt been working on his design for a few weeks, there was still no talk at all in Auschwitz at that time of cremating the corpses of the alleged gassing victims.

It follows that the only plausible historical reconstruction is as follows:

Upon his return from the meeting on 19 and 20 August 1942, Prüfer, who had returned to the company in Erfurt, told Sander about the tragic situation in Auschwitz due to the very high mortality caused by the typhus epidemic. Prüfer reported to him that the furnaces in the crematorium at the Main Camp were not capable of cremating the enormous amount of typhus victims that were dying every day.²⁷¹ Motivated by this, Sander took the initiative and designed a new mass-cremation furnace, which he drew up and completed in just over three weeks, in fact on 14 September. This way the timing coincides and is consistent. This reconstruction finds full confirmation in the beginning of Sander's reasoning for his invention as quoted by Schüle (p. 443):

"The strong demand for cremation furnaces for concentration camps – which has recently become particularly apparent for Auschwitz, and which, according to Mr. Prüfer's report, has again led to an order for 7 triple-muffle furnaces^[272] – prompted me to examine the question of whether the previous furnace system with muffles is the right one for the above-mentioned locations."

The patent application for the "Continuously Operating Corpse-Cremation Furnace for Mass Use" dated 4 November 1942 states:²⁷³

"The collection camps in the occupied eastern territories set up on account of the war and its consequences with their inevitably high mortality do not permit the interment of the large number of deceased camp occupants."

²⁷¹ Due to extreme stress, the Main Camp's crematorium chimney had been irreparably damaged and had to be replaced in June/July 1942. By 8 August 1942, a new chimney had been completed, and the furnaces were put back in full operation too fast, which caused the new chimney's masonry to be damaged as well, as Bischoff reported to the camp headquarters. Handwritten note "Schornstein-Krematorium. BW 11" dated 7 December 1942; RGVA, 502-1-318, pp. 4f.; letter by Bischoff dated 13 August 1942, RGVA, 502-1-312, p. 27. See Mattogno/Deana, Vol. 1, pp. 221-227.

²⁷³ Translation and reproduction in Mattogno/Deana, Vol. I, pp. 188-191; Vol. II, Doc. 155, pp. 225-232.

There is, on the one hand, a shortage of space and labor, and, on the other, the risk of exposing the vicinity, near or far, to the dangers presented directly or indirectly caused by any burial of the deceased, many of whom have succumbed to infectious diseases. The need thus exists to eliminate safely, quickly, and hygienically the corpses occurring frequently in large numbers."

The reference to "infectious diseases" clearly alludes to the typhus epidemic raging in Auschwitz in August 1942 along with other diseases. In spite of this, Schüle dares to comment as follows, in perfect disregard of the historical context (p. 171):

"[...] against better knowledge [!], the Topf Company argued that 'many people had died of infectious diseases' and thus presented its engineering achievement as safeguarding the hygienic relationship."

In this way, she distorts the reality of the facts, "against better knowledge" or in perfect ignorance.

In the historical context explained earlier, the mass-cremation projects should also be examined, particularly the "Annular Incineration Furnace" mentioned in the letter of 5 February 1943, and the "sixth crematorium" in the letter of 12 February 1943, with an "open cremation chamber." The dates are important.

What was the intended purpose of these facilities? According to orthodox Holocaust historiography, the exhumation and cremation of previously buried corpses (107,000 according to Höss) that began on 21 September 1942, ceased in early December 1942. On the 3rd of December, the inmates of the Sonderkommando who had performed this work were allegedly killed in the "gas chamber" of Crematorium I (Czech 1990, pp. 277f.). On 6 December, a new Sonderkommando was established (ibid., p. 280). Eric Friedler et al., who published a collection of testimonies by former members of the Sonderkommando, report (Friedler et al., pp. 91f.):

"While the decomposing bodies were exhumed and cremated, new victims from Bunkers 1 and 2 kept arriving. These fresh corpses were no longer buried in mass graves, but burned in specially constructed cremation pits. There, too, prisoners had to alternately pile wood and corpses on top of each other. At the beginning of December 1942, there were four cremation pits behind Bunker 2. They were each about 30 meters long, 7 meters wide and 3 meters deep. [...] The gassing victims from Bunker 1 were taken to cremation pits further away, with tracks also connecting the bunker to the pits."

Therefore, in February 1943, these cremation pits were in operation. According to Czech's Auschwitz Chronicle, about 18,700 Jews were "gassed" in the "bunkers" that month, averaging about 670 per day. In the previous month, the alleged gassing victims numbered about 45,700, averaging about 1,475 per day. Now, if the alleged cremation pits near the “bunkers” had disposed of this number of corpses without difficulty,²⁷⁴ what reason did the Central Construction Office have to search in February 1943 for additional mass cremation facilities for a number of corpses less than half that of January? The orthodox narrative is clearly nonsensical with respect to this question as well.

The only plausible explanation, therefore, is that the plans for mass cremation facilities in February 1943 concerned only “natural” camp mortality. In December 1942, there were about 4,600 “natural” deaths, in January 1943 about 4,500, and in February about 7,600.²⁷⁵ Work in the crematoria extended beyond the scheduled time,²⁷⁶ and the crematorium in the Main Camp was completely insufficient. To make up for the delays, the Central Construction Office considered the construction of rapidly built temporary mass-cremation facilities, which soon became redundant due to the completion of Crematoria II and IV in March.

Seen from the orthodox Holocaust perspective, these plans appear all the more senseless, because the bodies of registered inmates who died at the camp could have been cremated safely in the “cremation pits” of the “bunkers,” which, as mentioned earlier, supposedly had an extraordinary cremation capacity. In particular, the total of all alleged gassing victims of February 1943 (18,700) plus the inmates who died of “natural causes” (7,600) amounted to 26,300. This would have barely exceeded 57 percent of the bodies of the alleged gassing victims purportedly killed in the two “bunkers,” who were presumably cremated outdoors in January 1943.

The inescapable conclusion is that the mass cremation projects of February 1943, from the orthodox perspective, were perfectly useless for both the alleged gassing victims, and those of “natural mortality.”

Returning to Schüle, here is her comment regarding Jürgen Graf’s claims (p. 273):

“The revisionists, who deny the Holocaust, were alarmed when the interrogation testimonies of the men became known who had built the furnaces and equipped the gas chambers. In order to hold on to their old lies despite the new sources, they claim that the engineers were all forced to lie, which they ‘prove’ with false details, contradictions and a verbatim identity of questions and answers, which was possible caused by the translation.”

²⁷⁴ According to the claims by witness Szlama Dragon as made in his Soviet deposition dated 26 February 1945, the total capacity of the cremation pits was 17,000-18,000 corpses per day, with peak performances of 27,000-28,000! See Mattogno 2016a, p. 75.

²⁷⁵ Mattogno 2023a, pp. 189-193.

²⁷⁶ Himmler had ordered Crematoria II and IV to be completed by 31 January 1943, Crematoria III and V by 31 March. Letter by Central Construction Office to Topf dated 22 December 1942. APMO, BW 30/27, p. 51.

The fact that entire phrases and sentences the Soviet investigators had asked were repeated verbally by the interrogated engineers as there answers is not just a common pattern in the Russian text, but is so pedantic and annoying that it is undoubtedly one of the reasons that deterred Holocaust historians from publishing a complete set of the minutes. In fact, this is one of the most significant aspects of the interrogation technique of the Soviet interrogators: in practice, especially with regard to the main indictment, the one concerning the “gas chambers,” each question already bore within itself implicitly the answer, which the defendants had only to repeat and comment on.

Also typical is the engineers’ assumption of Soviet parlance, such as the adjectives “Nazi” and “fascist” (e.g., “Nazi party” and “Nazi government,” “fascist union” and “fascist Germany”) and “anti-fascist” (e.g., “anti-fascist statements,” “anti-fascist leaflets”) or the phrases “Auschwitz death camp,” “death factories” in reference to the crematoria at Birkenau, people “completely innocent,” “tortured to death in the gas chambers,” and “Hitler’s Germany,” an expression that even Schüle considers “unlikely” (Notes 66, p. 170). In this context, it should also be noted that Sander and Prüfer, in their respective interrogation on 7 and 19 March, introduced the issue of multiple-corpses cremations with the same, unusual locution:

Sander: “При этом он привел мне тогда пример...,” “pri etom on privel mne togda primier,” “He then gave me an example...”

Prüfer: “При этом Зандер привел пример...,” “pri etom Sander privel primier,” “Then I gave Sander the example...”

The expression “privel primier,” in the same context, then appears again in Sander’s interrogation on 13 March 1946. It is not very likely that the two engineers, instead of using the verbs “tell” or “report” or the like, had both on their own initiative spoken of “giving an example.”

As explained earlier, never would they have dared to contradict the dogma of the Soviet expert report on Auschwitz: If they had done so, they would have proved themselves to be hardened and unrepentant “Nazis” who were making a mockery of the Soviet investigators, and would have risked the death penalty, which, I remind the reader, was provided for the crimes ascribed to them by the decree of the Supreme Presidium of the Soviets of the USSR of 19 April 1943. Therefore, they preferred to make false confessions on the charges brought against them. This is the only way to explain their blatant lies and contradictions that I described earlier.

As for the alleged “alarm” that allegedly troubled Graf and me (the aforementioned “revisionists” are in fact the two of us), this is quite ridiculous, as I explained in Chapter 1, not to mention our alleged persistence “to hold on to [our] old lies despite the new sources.” In fact, as Schüle’s book itself shows, orthodox Holocaust historians are the ones who are really alarmed: although they have possessed copies of the Topf engineers’ interrogations since 2000 and 2003, respectively, neither the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum nor the Buchenwald Memorial have ever published them. The fact of the matter is that the only work that has put all of the Topf engineers’ interrogations in their entirety into the public domain is the present one (plus Graf’s 2002 work posted online, which accidentally omitted the protocols of the last two Schultze interrogations). This shows that the revisionists had nothing to fear from these “new sources,” as opposed to the orthodoxy. This is evident from the fact that Schüle dealt with the subject in a partial, superficial and uncritical manner, taking certain statements of the Topf engineers out of their context at will, with shrewd omissions, and merely pointing out a few erroneous details and a single contradiction (that of Sander) which she moreover left unexplained, passing in silence over all the problems I have set out earlier.

Add to all this the tragic incompetence of these historians regarding the issues debated in the interrogation reports, which would inevitably expose them to ridicule. Their historical-technical ignorance is matched only by their arrogance.

One of them, Michael Thad Allen, wrote in 2007 (Note 39, p. 174):

“Dr. Schule [recte: Schüle] informs me that some of the Topf [engineers’] interrogations that are not available to historians have found their way into the websites of Holocaust ‘deniers.’ Thus somebody is granting access to these records. It is, at the very least, an irritation that deniers are gaining fuller access than professional historians.” (Emphasis in original)

To be precise, the “deniers” possess all the interrogations, not some. In the Introduction, Jürgen Graf explained how we came into possessing them, through painstaking research and great perseverance, so that this “professional historian,” if he did not have access to this documentation, has only himself to blame. He did not find them merely because he did not look for them. This Thad Allen, who prided himself on being a member of the “Georgia Institute of Technology,” understood nothing of the technology of the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, as is evident from the ramblings contained in his article “The Devil in the Details: The Gas Chambers of Birkenau, October 1941,” which I exposed mercilessly in my related critique (Mattogno 2004b).

In reference to Pressac's historical archive, which contains the documentation of the Topf Company which Pressac found in late 1993 at the EMS Company (the new name of the old Topf Company), Schüle makes a revealing statement that confirms what I have set forth above (p. 362):

"It is easy to imagine the irreparable damage that would have been caused if revisionists had gained access to this archive."

"Irreparable damage" to what? Certainly to orthodox Holocaust historiography. Perhaps because the Topf Company's archive contains documents running contrary to the orthodox narrative that revisionists are not supposed to see?

Notes on Technical Terms

- крематорий (krematoriy), crematorium, Krematorium in German, is often used in the sense of “cremation furnace,” in German Einäscherungsofen or Verbrennungsofen.

- Вводные отверстия (vvodnye otverstiya), introduction opening, often stands for “muffle,” in German Muffel, a term sometimes transliterated into муфли (mufli), referring to the cremation chambers inside a cremation furnace (Verbrennungskammern).
- Druckluft-Anlage (pressured-air device or blower) of double-muffle and triple-muffle cremation furnaces is misleadingly called вентиляция (ventilyatsiya), ventilation, but sometimes also correctly воздуходувка (vozdukhoduvka), blower, which properly corresponds to the German term Druckluftgebläse.
- Труба (truba) “tubo,” and дымоход (dymokhod) designate the smoke duct (flue) that led from the muffle to the chimney mouth (German: Rauchkanal or Fuchs) or to the chimney flue (German: (Kamin-)Zug); дымоходная труба (dymokhodnaya truba) is generally the chimney (Schornstein) or the chimney duct (Zug).
- Нагрузка (nagruzka) is the muffle load (Beladung), meaning the contents loaded into it.
- количество (kolichestvo) “quantity, number, amount,” corresponding to the German term Belastung. It refers to the “load” of a furnace in terms of the number of cremations conducted in it.
- Камеры для трупов (kamery dlya trupov) means corpse chamber, hence morgue or mortuary (Leichenkammern in German).
- “Sonderkeller” (special basement) is rendered as специальные подвалы (spetsialnye podvaly)
- Вентиляционные установки (ventilyatsionnye ustanobki) denotes both the aeration-disaeration systems (German Be- und Entlüftungsanlagen) of Morgue #1 and the chimney’s forced-draft device (German Saugzuganlage); these are also occasionally called воздуходувки при печах (vozdukhoduvki pri pechakh), blowers next to the furnaces, but this expression should properly refer to the five pressured-air blowers No. 275 that were installed next to each of the five triple-muffle furnaces.²⁷⁸
- Газоизмерители (gazoizmeriteli), gas meters, is the translation of the German term Gasprüfer, combustion-gas analyzers.
- The German expression “Badeanstalten für Sonderaktionen” is rendered in Russian as бани специального назначения (bani spetsial’nogo naznachenya), bathrooms for special purpose.
- Reichspatentamt is translated as государственное управление патентов (gosudarstvennoe upravlenye patentov), State Patent Office.

²⁷⁸ I have indicated the location of these blowers in Mattogno/Dana, Vol. 2, Doc. 223a, p. 377.

- Руководство “СС” концлагerei (rukovodstvo “SS” kontslagerei), SS Directorate of Concentration Camps, and имперское руководство “СС” (imperskoe rukovodstvo “SS”), SS Directorate of the Reich, depending on the context, refers either to the Hauptamt Haushalt und Bauten (Main Office Budget and Construction) or to the SS-Wirtschafts-Verwaltungshauptamt (SS Economic and Administrative Main Office) for dates after 1 March 1942.

I) INTERROGATIONS OF KURT PRÜFER

1) Interrogation Protocol dated 5 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain of the Guard Shatunovsky [ШАТУНОВСКИЙ], Major of the Guard Moruzhenko [МОРУЖЕНКО]

Interpreter: Negnevitski [Негневички]

5 March 1946

We, the head of the 2nd division of “Smersh” of the 8th Army, Captain of the Guard Shatunovsky, and the deputy head of the second division, Major of the Guard Moruzhenko, interrogated the prisoner

Prüfer Kurt, son of Hermann, born in Erfurt in 1891, from a working-class family, clerk, with an intermediate technical education, engineer, German, citizen of the German state, resident of Erfurt, Bischleben district, Am Kirschberg 2.

[The detainee] was warned about responsibility for false statements (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

The interpreter was warned about responsibility for the accuracy of the translation (signed: Negnevitski).

Question: As of what year were you a member of the National-Socialist Party?

Answer: I became a member of the National-Socialist Party soon after Hitler came to power, in May 1933.

Question: Since when and in what function have you been working for the Topf Company?

Answer: I have been working for the Topf Company in Erfurt since 1920. Until 1923, I was a technician; from 1923 until recently, I worked as a senior engineer in the department for crematorium construction and heating.

Question: How many crematoria were built by the Topf Company over the years?

Answer: From 1912 to 1933, they built 110 crematoria, or 110 cremation furnaces.²⁷⁹ From 1933 to 1945 [sic], up to 50 cremation furnaces were built. From 1942 to 1945, up to 25 cremation furnaces were built.²⁸⁰

Question: From what year, where and in what number were crematoria built for the concentration camps in Germany?

Answer: The Topf Company began building crematoria for the concentration camps in 1940, and they were built in the following concentration camps:

In Buchenwald: A crematorium with two furnaces in 1941.

In Dachau: A crematorium with one furnace in 1940.

In Mauthausen: A crematorium with one furnace in 1943.

In Auschwitz: four crematoria with twelve furnaces in 1943 and 1944.²⁸¹

Question: How did the crematoria for the concentration camps differ from the civilian ones?

Answer: In civilian crematoria, there was one opening (muffle) for the cremation of the corpse, in rare cases two. In the crematoria for the concentration camps, there were three insertion openings. The size of the insertion opening was smaller in the crematoria for the concentration camps – 70 x 70 cm – and two meters long, compared to 90 x 90 cm and two meters thirty in the civil crematoria. Instead of a trolley on rails, on which the corpse in a coffin is moved into the opening, in the crematoria for the concentration camps, the corpse is pushed into the furnace on a hand-carried stretcher without a coffin. In the civilian crematoria, a special bellows is used to blow in preheated air, which causes the corpse to burn more quickly and without smoke. The construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps is different; it does not allow the air to be heated in advance, which is why the corpse burns more slowly and with smoke. Ventilation is used to reduce the smoke and the smell of the burning corpse.

Question: How many corpses could be cremated per hour in a crematorium in Auschwitz?

Answer: In a crematorium with five furnaces or fifteen openings (muffles),²⁸² fifteen corpses were cremated in one hour.

²⁷⁹ The actual number, until 1934, was 74 furnaces.

²⁸¹ This date is incorrect; the crematoria were all finished in 1943.

Question: When were you personally commissioned to build crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: In 1940, the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, asked me to visit him, and suggested that I build crematoria in which each furnace should have three introduction openings (muffles). He pointed out to me that the order had come from the SS leadership. I immediately set about constructing a crematorium oven with three muffles. It should be noted that I had already designed such furnaces with three muffles together with Ludwig Topf in 1939, and had submitted my projects to the German War Ministry. In 1940, the SS accepted the crematorium with the [triple-muffle] furnaces I had designed.²⁸³ A few weeks later, I learned that the furnaces I had built had been accepted by the SS leadership for the construction of crematoria in concentration camps.

Question: Who was involved with you in the construction of the crematoria?

Answer: I designed the cremation furnace, the technician Keller²⁸⁴ drew them, but Schultze designed the air duct to the furnace and the ventilation of the crematorium. The latter took part in the work in 1941/1942.

Question: How often and for what purpose did you travel to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: As an engineer and head of the crematorium-construction department, I went to Auschwitz five times. The first time was at the beginning of 1943,²⁸⁵ to receive instructions from the SS on where to build the crematorium. The second time in the spring of 1943,²⁸⁶ to inspect the site and examine the reason for erecting the crematorium chimney. The third time in the fall of 1943; I was requested to come by the SS leadership because errors had occurred during the construction of the crematorium chimney.²⁸⁷ The fourth time at the beginning of 1944, to examine the crematorium chimney, whose inner refractory brickwork was beginning to crumble. The fifth time in September/October 1944; I was ordered by the ²⁸² This refers to Crematoria II/III, each of which was equipped with five triple-muffle furnaces.

²⁸³ In his letter to Ludwig and Ernst Wolfgang Topf dated 6 December 1941 Prüfer wrote: "As you know, I have worked out the triple-muffle as well as the 8-muffle cremation furnaces, mostly using my free time at home." APMO, BW 30/46, p. 6.

²⁸⁴ The Russian text says Келлер, Keller, but this is a mistranscription. Prüfer meant Hans Köhler, who was precisely a technical draftsman in the company's D IV department.

²⁸⁵ This should be 1942, because by early 1943, the new crematorium (which later became Crematorium II) was already in an advanced stage of construction.

²⁸⁶ Here, too, it must be 1942. In the spring of 1943, the crematorium was already in operation.

²⁸⁷ The design errors I explained in Chapter 7.3.

SS leadership to dismantle the crematoria of the Auschwitz Camp and to carefully pack up the equipment and the brickwork so that they could be transferred to another location. In my opinion, this was due to the fact that the front was approaching. On all my trips, I did what was necessary to carry out the instructions of the SS leadership of the concentration camp, but I couldn't do the latter because there was no manpower, so the crematoria were not dismantled.²⁸⁸

Question: Were you on a business trip to Auschwitz Concentration Camp together with Schultze?

Answer: Yes. I was on the business trip to Auschwitz Concentration Camp together with Schultze in the spring of 1943.

Question: What did you observe together with Schultze in the Auschwitz Camp?

Answer: I personally saw an SS woman with dogs herding female prisoners into the barracks. I also saw Jews digging up earth with their hands under SS guard, and carrying it from one place to another. When I was in the crematorium, at about 10 o'clock in the morning, I saw for myself that there were up to 60 corpses of men and women of various ages lying on the ground, ready to be cremated in the crematorium. Six bodies were cremated in my presence, and I came to the conclusion that the furnaces were working well.

Question: Did you see gas chambers next to the crematoria?²⁸⁹

Answer: Yes, I saw a gas chamber outside,²⁹⁰ because there was a wooden barracks, from it there was a connection to the gas chamber; from the gas chamber, there was a connection to the crematorium.²⁹¹

Question: Did you know that completely innocent people were exterminated in the gas chambers and crematoria?

Answer: From spring 1943, I knew that completely innocent people were exterminated in gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and that their bodies were then burned in crematoria.

Question: What did Schultze Karl tell you about the bodies you saw lying at the crematorium?

²⁸⁸ This is inaccurate. The crematoria were dismantled. Parts of the metal structure were stored in an inaccessible room in the former Auschwitz Crematorium I until the 1990s.

²⁸⁹ возле, "vozle," "near," "next to."

²⁹⁰ снаружи "snaruzhi," "outside."

²⁹¹ Шел деревянный барак, от него было сообщеине с газкамерой, от газкамеры было сообщеине с крематорием, "shol derevyanny barak, ot nego bylo soobsheine s gazkameroy, ot gazkamery bylo soobsheine s krematorem."

Answer: In the spring of 1943, Schultze told me, in the morning in the crematorium, about the bodies of up to sixty men, women and children lying there, that they had been murdered in gas chambers.

Question: What equipment did the Topf Company design for the gas chambers?

Answer: The gas chamber, where the Topf Company installed a ventilation system, was initially called a “room for corpses”²⁹² in the factory, but it later became clear that this was a gas chamber for killing people.

Question: Who was the designer of the ventilation equipment in the gas chambers?

Answer: The designer of the ventilation systems in the gas chambers was Schultze; he set them up.

Question: Explain truthfully why the inner fireclay lining [в трубах, trubakh] in the chimneys of the crematorium in the Auschwitz Camp crumbled so often!

Answer: The inner fireclay lining of the crematorium chimneys in Auschwitz began to crumble after only half a year as a result of the colossal stress [нагрузки, nagruzki] to which these crematoria were exposed in the concentration camp.

Question: So even though you already knew in the spring of 1943 that the cremation furnaces you had designed were being used to exterminate innocent people, you continued to work in this field?

Answer: Yes, that’s right. Although I knew that the crematoria furnaces I designed and built were intended for the extermination of innocent people in the concentration camps, I nevertheless continued to work in this field, and was twice more in Auschwitz in the camps [plural].

Question: Did Willi Wiemokli²⁹³ talk to you about the fact that living people were burned in the furnaces of the crematorium?

Answer: Yes, there was such a conversation in recent times [presumably: at the end of the time when the camp existed], but I remember telling him at the time that this could not be true because the furnaces were too small.

Question: What motivated you, even after you learned that the crematoria you had designed were intended for the execution of people, to stay ²⁹² Improper translation of German Leichenkeller.

²⁹³ Willy Wiemokli was a Mischling, who was arrested in 1938 and interned in Buchenwald amp; after his release in 1939, he was employed by the Topf Company. Between 1939 and 1944, he was arrested three times by the Gestapo. The story of people being burned alive in the furnaces was simply low-grade propaganda.

with the Topf Company and continue working as a designer in the construction of these crematoria?

Answer: I had a contract with the Topf Company and realized that my work was very important for the National-Socialist state, and that, if I gave up this work, I would be destroyed by the Gestapo. I was afraid of that, and I continued to work as a designer and head of the crematorium construction department.

My statements have been correctly written down; they were read to me in German translation, and I sign in that language. (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

Interrogated by:

The head of the 2nd section of the counterintelligence service “Smersh” 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard, Captain Shatunovsky (signed: Shatunovsky) deputy head of the 2nd section, Major of the Guard Moruzhenko (signed: Moruzhenko).

2) Interrogation Protocol dated 7 March 1946

Interrogator: Lieutenant of the Guard Malyschko [Малышко]

Interrogatee: Kurt Prüfer

I, Lieutenant of the Guard Malyschko, operational command 2nd section of the counterintelligence service “Smersh” of the 8th Guard Army, questioned the detainee

Prüfer, Kurt, son of Hermann, born in 1891, a native of the city of Erfurt from a working-class family, clerk, with intermediate technical education, engineer, German, German citizen.

Question: Where does your family currently live?

Answer: My family? My wife lives in the village of Bischleben, Am Kirschberg 2.

Question: What position did you hold in the NSDAP?

Answer: I joined the National-Socialist Party in 1933, but did not hold any leading positions.

[The interrogation on March 7 consisted only of these two questions.]

The transcript with my statements was transcribed accurately and was read to me and I subscribe it (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

The interrogation was conducted through the German-language interpreter Negnevitski

Interrogated by: Lieutenant of the Guard Malyschko, operational command 2nd section of the counter-intelligence service “Smersh” of the 8th Guard Army (signed: Malyschko).

3) Interrogation Protocol dated 15 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain of the Guard Morskoi [Морской], investigating judge.

Interpreter: Datsyuk [Дацюк].

On 15 March 1946, I, the investigating judge of the counterintelligence service “Smersh” of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi, interrogated the detainee

Prüfer, Kurt, son of Hermann, born 1891, native of and resident of Erfurt, Bischleben district, clerk, married, with intermediate technical education. Member of the NSDAP since 1933.

The interrogation was conducted through interpreter Datsyuk, who was warned against unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic.

Question: After you joined the NSDAP in 1933, what leading positions did you hold in this party?

Answer: During the entire time I was a member of the National-Socialist Party, I did not hold any leading positions.

Question: Apart from the NSDAP, which other fascist organizations were you a member of?

Answer: Apart from the NSDAP, I belonged to the National-Socialist organizations Arbeitsfront (from 1933) and NSFAU²⁹⁴ (from 1935). I did not hold any leading positions in these organizations either.

Question: What is your profession?

Answer: I am a civil engineer by profession.

Question: Where and as what did you last work?

Answer: From 1920 until recently, I worked for the Topf Company in Erfurt. Initially, I worked there as a technician, later as a senior engineer in the department crematorium construction and heating.

Question: Were you involved in the construction of crematoria?

Answer: Yes, I worked in the Topf Company as chief engineer in the department crematorium construction and heating, and designed crematoria during this time.

Question: What types of crematoria did you design?

Answer: I designed stationary and mobile types of crematoria.

Question: When did the Topf Company start building crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: The Topf Company began building crematoria for concentration camps in 1940 or 1941; I don't remember exactly.

²⁹⁴ “НСФАУ” in the text, presumably Nationalsozialistische Freie Arbeiter-Union.

Question: Who placed the orders for the construction of crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: The orders for the construction of crematoria came from the SS concentration camp leadership, but also from the Reich leadership [ot imperskogo rukovodstva] of the SS in Berlin.

Question: Were you personally involved in the design and construction of crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: Yes, in 1940 I began to design and build crematoria for the concentration camps. In that year, I was called to the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, who suggested that I build crematoria in which each furnace should have three introduction openings/muffles. At the time, Topf drew my attention to the fact that this order had arrived from the SS leadership, and had to be fulfilled on time. It should be noted that I had already designed furnaces with three muffles together with Ludwig Topf in 1939, and had submitted my projects to the German War Ministry. In 1940, the SS leadership accepted the crematoria with three muffles that I had designed, after which the Topf Company, with my direct involvement, went on to build these crematoria for the concentration camps.

Question: How did the crematoria you designed for the concentration camps differ from the other crematoria you built?

Answer: The difference between the crematoria I designed and built for the concentration camps and the other civilian crematoria I built is that in the furnaces of the former, there were three insertion openings/muffles, and in the latter there was only one, rarely two. The crematoria with three openings were built because they had a larger capacity, i.e. more bodies could be cremated in them. In addition, these crematoria also saved fuel.

Question: How many crematoria were built for the concentration camps with your direct involvement?

Answer: From 1940 until 1944, up to 20 crematoria were built for the German concentration camps with my direct involvement.²⁸⁰

Question: For which camps?

Answer: The Topf Company built crematoria for the following camps: Buchenwald, Dachau, Mauthausen, Auschwitz, Gross-Rosen.

Question: Who approved your projects?

Answer: The projects for the crematoria I designed were reviewed by the chief engineer of the Topf Company, Sander, who had also headed the department crematorium construction for a time. Sander reviewed my projects, and found deficiencies in them, made improvements, after which he personally approved these projects, and then submitted them to Ludwig Topf for approval.

Question: Who took part in building the crematoria with you?

Answer: Together with me, the technician Keller [Köhler] and the engineer Schultze took part in the construction of the crematorium. I designed the cremation furnace, Keller drew, and Schultze designed the blower [воздуходувку, vozdukhoduvku] and the ventilation for the crematorium.

Question: When did Schultze start working with you on the construction of the blowers and ventilation?

Answer: Schultze began working with me on the construction of the blowers and ventilation in 1940 or 1941. I don't remember the exact year.

The questioning ended at 3 p.m.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed correctly, was read to me by the interpreter in my native language, and I sign it (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

Interrogator: investigating judge of the counterintelligence service "Smersh" of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi (signed: Morskoi).

Interpreter: Datsyuk (signed: Datsyuk).

4) Interrogation Protocol dated 19 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain of the Guard Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk

19 March 1946

The interrogation begins at 21:00

The interrogation is conducted through the interpreter Datsyuk, who [signs] for the penalties of an unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Datsyuk).

Question: Tell me, did the Topf Company build gas chambers?

Answer: No, the Topf Company did not build gas chambers. Said company only built ventilation systems for gas chambers; engineer Schultze was responsible for the design and installation of the ventilation systems.

Question: How many ventilation systems for the gas chambers did Schultze install, and in which concentration camps?

Answer: Schultze only installed two ventilation systems²⁹⁵ for two gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp; the other ventilation sys-²⁹⁵ Prüfer thus asserted that no ventilation systems were installed in Crematoria IV and V, and he reiterated this even more explicitly in the interrogation on 4 March 1948 ("...to tems and blowers were intended for the furnaces of the crematoria in the concentration camps.

Question: Which camps did you go to?

Answer: I went to the concentration camps Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Gross-Rosen.

Question: When did you visit these concentration camps?

Answer: I went to Buchenwald Concentration Camp at the end of 1940 or beginning of 1941, I don't remember exactly. I went to Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp in 1943, and I went to Auschwitz Concentration Camp six times between 1941 and 1944.

Question: For what purpose did you travel to the concentration camps?

Answer: I traveled to Buchenwald to install the furnaces in the concentration-camp crematorium. I traveled to Auschwitz Concentration Camp to install and set up the furnaces in the crematoria built there, but also to install the furnaces in the disinfestation chamber [v desinfektsionnoi kamere].²⁹⁶

Question: How many crematoria were there in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: There were four crematoria in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, in which I installed twelve furnaces that I had designed and built. Of these crematoria, two had one furnace each,²⁹⁷ the other two had five furnaces each;²⁹⁸ in the latter, engineer Schultze installed the ventilation systems.

Question: Were the crematoria tested during your presence in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: Of the six times I visited the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, only once, at the beginning of 1943, was a test carried out in my presence on two of the five furnaces I had set up in the newly built crematorium. Six corpses of men of different ages were cremated in all [both furnaces], and there in the crematorium were also corpses of women and children who my knowledge, they did possess no ventilation system”), although they had been ordered from Topf by Central Construction Office chief Bischoff on 8 May 1943. See in this regard Mattogno 2019, Chapter 5.10., pp. 156-158.

²⁹⁶ In 1943 in the Zentralsauna at Birkenau (BW 32), the Topf Company installed “a disinfestation facility consisting of two furnaces with four chambers,” according to the cost estimate dated 5 February 1943; RGVA, 502-2-27, pp. 27-30. These were two hot-air disinfestation furnaces. The hot air was produced by two furnaces installed in the Zentralsauna's basement.

²⁹⁷ Crematoria IV and V, each of which was equipped with an eight-muffle cremation furnace (Achtmuffel-Einäscherungsofen).

²⁹⁸ Crematoria II and II, each of which was equipped with five triple-muffle cremation furnaces (Dreimuffel-Einäscherungsöfen).

had been murdered in the gas chambers, and who were to be cremated in the crematorium. The total number of corpses was about sixty.

Question: How did you participate in the cremation of the bodies of murdered, innocent people?

Answer: I checked whether the furnaces I had installed in the crematorium were working.

Question: What conclusion did you draw?

Answer: I concluded that the furnaces I built in the crematorium worked well and without any problems.

Question: Who of the engineers and technicians on the staff of the Topf Company took part in the installation of the crematoria apart from you?

Answer: Apart from myself, engineer Schultze was also present in the concentration camp when the crematoria were installed in the spring of 1943.

Question: What was Schultze's part in the cremation of the corpses?

Answer: Engineer Schultze's participation in the cremation of the bodies of those murdered in the gas chamber consisted of him carrying out an inspection of the ventilation equipment [forced-draft devices]²⁹⁹ in the crematorium during the cremation of the bodies.

Question: How long did you stay in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: I did not stay there for more than two days after my trips to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: Did you go there with engineer Schultze in the spring of 1943?

Answer: No, Engineer Schultze had already traveled to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp a few days before my arrival.

Question: When did you find out that innocent people were being exterminated and burned in the concentration camps?

Answer: I learned about this in the spring of 1943, when the bodies of people murdered in the gas chamber of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were cremated in my presence during the testing of the furnaces in the crematorium.

Question: When you returned to the Topf Company from your business trip, from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in the spring of 1943, who did you talk to about your stay in Auschwitz?

²⁹⁹ Вентиляционных установок, ventilyatsionnikh ustanovok.

Answer: When I returned from the business trip, from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in the spring of 1943, I talked to the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and to the chief engineer, Sander.

Question: What did you tell Sander about your trip to Auschwitz?

Answer: I reported to Sander that I had been present during the testing of the furnaces in the crematorium of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and had come to the conclusion that the crematoria could not cope with the number of corpses [не справляются с таким количеством трупов: ne spravlyayutsya s takim kolichestvom trupov] to be cremated there, as the furnaces of the crematoria were not efficient enough. Then I gave Sander the example that in Auschwitz, in my presence, two corpses were shoved into an introduction opening/muffle instead of just one, and that the furnaces of the crematorium could not cope with this load [и то печи крематория не справлялись с той нагрузкой: i to pechi krematoriya ne spravlyalis' s toy nagruzkoj] because there were so many [очень много, ochen' mnogo] corpses to burn. At that time, I also told Sander that the corpses I had seen were of people who had previously been murdered in gas chambers.

Question: After the conversation with Sander, did you start designing new, improved crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: No, we continued to build crematoria of the same type for the concentration camps. However, I am aware that Sander was personally involved in the design of a new, improved type of crematorium, but I cannot say anything specific about this project. [This is followed by an incomprehensible, probably incorrectly transcribed half-sentence.]

Question: If you knew that innocent people were being exterminated in the crematoria you designed, why did you continue to work in this field anyway?

Answer: Firstly, I was bound by a contract with the Topf Company as a civil engineer. Secondly, I realized that my work in the field of designing and building cremation furnaces for the concentration camps was very important for fascist Germany. Thirdly, I was afraid to give up this work, because I could have been destroyed by the Gestapo;³⁰⁰ this is why I continued to design crematoria, and head the department crematorium construction.

The interrogation ends at 1:50.

³⁰⁰ This excuse is obviously completely unfounded.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed correctly, was read to me by the interpreter in my native language, and I sign it (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

5) Interrogation Protocol dated 20 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain of the Guard Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk

March 20, 1946.

The interrogation began at 21:00

The interrogation was conducted through the interpreter Datsyuk, who [signs] for the penalties of an unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Datsyuk).

Question: As chief engineer in the department crematorium construction of the Topf Company, you have been charged with having designed and manufactured crematoria furnaces for the concentration camps, in which the bodies of innocent people of various nationalities were burned who had been tortured by the Germans in the concentration camps. You checked the functioning of the cremation furnaces in the concentration camps. The crimes committed by you are covered by the first part of the decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR of 19 April 1943. Do you understand the charges brought against you, and to what specifically do you plead guilty?

Answer: The indictment filed in accordance with the first part of the decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR of 19 April 1943 has been explained to me, and is understandable. I plead fully guilty to having worked as chief engineer in the department crematorium construction at the Topf Company in Erfurt. I personally designed crematoria furnaces, 150 of which were manufactured during the entire time I worked in this field. During the war that Germany waged against the countries of Europe, up to 20 of the aforementioned number of crematoria furnaces were built with my direct involvement by order of the SS leadership, for the concentration camps Buchenwald, Auschwitz, Dachau, Mauthausen and Gross-Rosen. In them, the bodies of completely innocent people of various nationalities were cremated who had been tortured by the Germans in the aforementioned concentration camps. I was involved in the design and construction of crematorium ovens and their installation in the concentration camps, and for this purpose I traveled to the concentration camps. When we were present in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in the spring of 1943, where we checked the cremation furnaces as well as the functioning of the ventilation systems,³⁰¹ the corpses of completely innocent people of various ages and nationalities, who had been tortured by the Germans, were cremated with my participation, as well as the participation of engineer Sander, who designed and installed the ventilation equipment and blowers for the cremation furnaces.

The interrogation ends at 11:30.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed correctly, was read to me by the interpreter in my native language, and I sign it (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

Interrogator: The investigating judge of the counterintelligence service “Smersh” of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi (signed: Morskoi).

6) Interrogation Protocol dated 27 March 1946

Interrogator: Major Tereshchenko [Терещенко]

Interpreter: Garelik [Гарелик]

27 March 1946.

I, head of the 2nd section of the 4th office of the “Smersh” service of the Soviet army group in Germany, Major Tereshchenko, today interrogated through the German-speaking interpreter Garelik the defendant

Prüfer, Kurt, son of Hermann, born 1891, native of the city of Erfurt (Germany), from a working-class family, of clerical social position, with intermediate technical training, engineer, German, German citizen, married, member of the Nazi party since 1943 [recte: 1933].

The interrogation begins at 23:00 and ends at 4:00.

The interpreter was warned about responsibility for an unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Garelik).

Question: What is your last and first name?

Answer: My last name is Prüfer, my first name is Kurt. I have no other names.

³⁰¹ In fact, the forced-draft systems of Crematorium II.

Question: Which languages do you speak, and in which [plural] do you intend to give your testimony?

Answer: I have a perfect command of German, and can speak some French. I will give my testimony in German.

Question: Who are your parents?

Answer: My father Hermann Prüfer was a railroad worker; he died in 1918. My mother was a housewife; she is also dead.

Question: Which German political parties were you a member of?

Answer: I joined the Nazi Party of Germany in 1933.

Question: What leading positions did you hold in the party?

Answer: I was a paying member of the party.

Question: What is your profession?

Answer: I am a civil engineer by profession.

Question: Tell us about your official activities.

Answer: I completed my apprenticeship in 1910, and started working for the Topf Company in the city of Erfurt, where I worked until October 1912, when I was drafted into the army. After my discharge from the army in 1918, I attended a course on reinforced concrete at the technical college for a year, and then, in April 1920, I started working for the Topf Company again, where I was employed until my arrest, and held the position of a leading engineer in the field of furnace construction.

Question: How long has the Topf Company existed, and what products does it manufacture?

Answer: The Topf Company has existed since 1878, and was run by the two Topf brothers, one of whom, Ludwig, poisoned himself and died after the capitulation of Germany, while the other, Ernst, lived in the American occupation zone. The company manufactured: cranes for loading and unloading ships; sanitary disinfestation chambers,³⁰² furnaces for incinerating the carcasses of animals that died during scientific experiments; cremation furnaces; during the war it manufactured individual parts for airplanes and shells for anti-aircraft guns, as well as machines for cleaning gasoline, and it fulfilled orders from the German authorities for the manufacture of furnaces for incinerating corpses in concentration camps. Today, the company fulfills orders of the Soviet administration for the production of aircraft parts, bomb processing, the construction of disinfestation chambers, etc.

³⁰² Санитарные дезинфекционные камеры, sanitarnye dezinfektsionnye kamery: allusion to hot-air disinfestation systems such as the disinfestation facility of the Zentralsauna mentioned earlier.

Question: When did the company receive the order from the leading German authorities to manufacture furnaces for crematoria, and from whom exactly?

Answer: The order came from the SS staff in 1940 or 1941, I don't remember exactly.

Question: What was the scope of these orders?

Answer: We had to produce two furnaces for cremating corpses for the Buchenwald Concentration Camp, one for Dachau, two for Gross-Rosen, one for Mauthausen and twelve for Auschwitz.

Question: Was this order fulfilled by the company?

Answer: By 1 April 1943, this order had been completely fulfilled by the company.

Question: Who constructed these furnaces and installed them in the concentration camps?

Answer: I designed the furnaces, and under my direction they were installed in the concentration camps Buchenwald, Gross-Rosen and Auschwitz. The company's craftsmen built the furnaces; prisoners in the concentration camps were also used for this work.

The interrogation is now finished.

My statements were transcribed exactly and read to me in understandable German. (Signed: Kurt Prüfer).

Interrogator: The head of the 2nd section of the 4th Service Office "Smersh" of the Soviet Troop Group in Germany, Major Tereshchenko.

Interpreter: Garelik.

7) Interrogation Protocol dated 11 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 14:00 and ended at 18:00.

Question: Tell us how long and in what position you worked at the German engineering company Topf and Sons in the city of Erfurt!

Answer: I worked continuously at Topf and Sons from 1920 until the day of my arrest as a senior engineer in the design office, Department D-1U; I was head of the design and construction group for heating equipment and cremation furnaces.

Question: To what extent were you involved in the work of the Topf Company in the production of crematoria for the German concentration camps?

Answer: As a senior engineer in the field of design and construction of heating equipment, I was directly involved in the work of the Topf Company in the field of manufacturing crematoria for the German concentration camps. For this purpose, I travelled to concentration camps several times on behalf of the company, where I organized and directed the work on the construction of cremation furnaces on site and was also involved in the installation of these furnaces.

Question: In which concentration camps did the Topf Company build crematoria, and on whose behalf?

Answer: The Topf Company built crematoria in the concentration camps on behalf of the Central Construction Office of the Reichsführer SS. The company first built a crematorium with two furnaces in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp in 1940/1941.³⁰³ In the following years up to the day of Germany's capitulation, the company built around 20 furnaces for the crematoria in the concentration camps Dachau, Gross-Rosen, Mauthausen and Auschwitz. I clearly remember that the company built 12 three-muffle furnaces for four crematoria in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.³⁰⁴

Question: Did you build the furnaces for the crematoria in the concentration camps?

Answer: No, I only built the furnaces for the concentration camps Buchenwald, Gross-Rosen and Auschwitz. The construction of the crematoria in the other concentration camps [plural]³⁰⁵ was the responsibility of the Topf Company's representative in Munich. This branch was headed by the company's chief engineer Emprecht, who died in the bombing of Munich in 1944.

Question: Who from the Topf Company personally led the negotiations with the SS authorities regarding the construction of furnaces for the concentration camps, and the installation of gas chambers in the concentration camps?

Answer: I have already said that the Topf Company began building cremation furnaces in 1940. We were first approached by the head of the SS construction office of the Buchenwald Concentration Camp, a certain Grosch.³⁰⁶ On the instructions of the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, I ³⁰³ In 1940, the Topf Company delivered one coke-fired double-muffle cremation furnace and one oil-fired mobile double-muffle furnace to the camp administration.

³⁰⁴ At Auschwitz, as has already been noted, ten triple-muffle furnaces and two eight-muffle furnaces were installed.

³⁰⁵ The plural is unwarranted because only Mauthausen is missing from the list compiled by Prüfer.

³⁰⁶ SS Obersturmführer Gerhard Grosch, head of construction of the Buchenwald Camp.

conducted negotiations with Grosch about the construction of two cremation furnaces in Buchenwald. Soon afterwards, a representative of the SS Reich Office,³⁰⁷ whose name I can no longer remember, visited the Topf Company in Erfurt to conduct negotiations with Ludwig Topf regarding the construction of crematoria in other concentration camps. He did not specify which ones at the time. At the invitation of the head of the company, I and the head of the planning department, Mersch,³⁰⁸ also took part in these negotiations. At the time, it was contractually agreed with the representative of the SS Reich Office that the Topf Company would assume responsibility for the construction of cremation furnaces in the concentration camps, but it was also agreed that in each specific case written agreements or contracts should be concluded directly with the SS construction office of the concentration camp in question, i.e. with the clients. This is how it was subsequently handled. Apart from these two cases, I also conducted negotiations with the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp on the construction of cremation furnaces and ventilation equipment for the gas chambers. As a rule, all written agreements or contracts on these matters were signed by the head of the company, Ludwig Topf. In addition to what I have just said, I would like to add that, during these negotiations, the SS construction office of the concentration camps did not raise the issue of equipping the gas chambers.

Question: Were you personally aware of the purposes for which the company built crematoria and gas chambers in the concentration camps?

Answer: Until 1943, I was not informed about the actual aims and purpose of the crematoria built in the concentration camps. I only became aware of them when I visited the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. Before that, the representatives of the SS construction offices, who led the negotiations with the Topf Company, explained that the crematoria were built in the concentration camps to burn the bodies of prisoners who had died of natural causes as a result of epidemics. I only found out about the existence of gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp when I visited the camp in 1943. Before that, I had known nothing about their existence or purpose. At the same time, I would like to emphasize that the gas chambers in the concentration camps were not built by the Topf Company. I only know that two ventilation systems for the gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were installed by the Topf Company.

³⁰⁷ The cremation furnaces were ordered from the Topf Company first by the Hauptamt Haushalt und Bauten, later by the SS-Wirtschafts-Verwaltungshauptamt.

³⁰⁸ Heinrich Mersch, head of the department Generalplan.

Question: What specifically did you learn about the real purpose of the crematoria and gas chambers that were built during your visit to this camp in 1943?

Answer: During my visit to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in 1943, I became aware that a mass extermination of prisoners was taking place in this camp, including women, children and old people who had been sent to Auschwitz by the Hitlerites³⁰⁹ in whole transports from the European countries occupied by Germany. The prisoners who arrived at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were sent by the SS to the gas chambers, where they were murdered, and then their bodies were burned in the crematoria and on special pyres.

Question: So when you were involved in building the furnaces for the crematorium in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, you knew that they were intended for the extermination of completely innocent people?

Answer: Yes, I knew that.

Question: What prompted you to become actively involved in this work?

Answer: After I became aware of the actual purpose of the crematorium in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I decided not to take part in its construction and informed company boss Ludwig Topf of this. In response, [Ludwig] Topf told me that the construction of the crematoria in the concentration camps was being carried out by the company on behalf of the Reich Office of the SS, and that, if I refused to take part in this work, I could be arrested as a saboteur and imprisoned in a concentration camp. Therefore, for fear of losing my job and being subjected to reprisals, I dropped my original plan and continued to fulfill all the company's orders to build crematoria in the concentration camps. I had no other motives.

Question: Did the fact that you had belonged to the Nazi party since 1933 not influence your decision?

Answer: Of course, my membership of the Nazi party, whose ideas I shared, obliged me to loyally support all measures taken by the German government bodies – including the SS Reich Office – and to lend a hand in the implementation of these measures. However, in the present case, I took the decision to continue work on the design and construction of the crematoria for fear of reprisals and not for any other reason. In the opposite case, I would not have asked Ludwig Topf to be released from this work.

Question: What did the Topf-and-Sons engineers Braun Gustav and Schultze Karl have to do with the construction of the crematoria?

³⁰⁹ Another typical Soviet propaganda term.

Answer: Braun Gustav was the head of production at Topf and Sons, and under his leadership, the iron structures and individual parts for the crematoria that the company built in the concentration camps were manufactured in the Erfurt factory. Chief engineer Schultze Karl was involved in the construction, and supervised the assembly of, the ventilation equipment for the cremation furnaces and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: Did Braun and Schultze travel to concentration camps in connection with the construction of the crematoria?

Answer: As far as I know, Braun Gustav did not travel to any concentration camps. Schultze Karl traveled to the Auschwitz concentration camp several times, where he supervised the assembly of the ventilation equipment for the cremation furnaces and gas chambers on site, and he also inspected this equipment. I can no longer remember whether he also visited other concentration camps.

The record of the interrogation was read to me in German translation, my statements were transcribed correctly.

8) Interrogation Protocol dated 13 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Deyerchun [Дейерчун]

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

13 February 1948

The interrogation started at 12:15 and ended at 17:20.

Question: How long have you known the Topf engineer Gustav Braun, and what was your relationship with him?

Answer: I have known engineer Gustav Braun since the day he started working at Topf, hence since about 1936.³¹⁰ I was not more-closely acquainted with him, and I only rarely met him on business matters. My relationship with Braun was purely of an official nature; there was never any private contact between us.

Question: In what position did Braun G. work at Topf and Sons?

³¹⁰ Gustav Braun started working for the Topf Company on 1 May 1935.

Answer: Braun Gustav was production manager at Topf and Sons, and was directly in charge of the company's mechanical-engineering department. As far as I could ascertain, Braun was always very close to the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and when he and his brother (the co-owner of the company) were absent, he decided all matters relating to the company's activities.

Question: What specifically fell within Braun's area of responsibility as production manager at Topf?

Answer: Braun was responsible for all of Topf's production activities, and directly managed the company's operations in Erfurt. In particular, Braun dealt with the hiring and firing of workers; he had the right to reprimand and punish workers. Together with the planning department, Braun drew up the company's production plans.

Question: To what extent did Braun Gustav participate in the fulfillment of the orders issued by the SS authorities for the construction and equipping of the crematoria in the concentration camps by the Topf Company?

Answer: It was in the nature of his work that Braun participated directly in the fulfillment of the orders placed by the SS authorities through the Topf Company, i.e. he and the company's planning department included these orders in the production plans, and set the deadlines for their fulfillment. This also meant that, if these orders required the manufacture of any individual parts or fittings in the company's engineering plant, these were produced under Braun's supervision, i.e. he managed this plant directly. I would like to add to what has been said so far that in the situation at the time, the orders of the SS authorities were fulfilled by the company in an accelerated manner; only military orders were classified as even more urgent.

Question: What was produced in the company managed by Braun in accordance with these orders from the SS authorities?

Answer: Under Braun's management, the company produced individual parts and iron fittings for the cremation furnaces and ventilation systems, the construction and assembly of which was carried out by the Topf Company in accordance with the orders of the SS authorities in the concentration camps.

Question: Who from the Topf Company directly carried out the construction and assembly work on the cremation furnaces and the ventilation equipment for the gas chambers in the concentration camps, especially in Auschwitz?

Answer: The construction and assembly work on the cremation furnaces, chimneys, smoke ducts and ventilation equipment in the concentration camps was carried out directly on site by the assembly office of the Topf Company, whose head was engineer Schuchardt;³¹¹ I don't know his first name. The assembly office was directly subordinate to Braun as the company's production manager. I know that the construction and assembly of the cremation furnaces and smoke ducts in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp was carried out by the chief fitters of the assembly department [Wilhelm] Koch and [Martin] Holick, while the ventilation equipment for the crematoria and gas chambers was installed by fitter [Heinrich] Messing. From time to time, these fitters sent the reports and notices on the progress of this work to the company management, namely to the boss Ludwig Topf, who looked through them, and then forwarded them to Braun with his comments. I also looked through these documents with Braun's signature, i.e. I was obliged to check whether this work had been carried out correctly and in accordance with the drawings I had received.

Question: As can be seen from your statements, Braun, as head of production, was not only informed about the orders of the SS construction office of Auschwitz and other concentration camps, which were fulfilled by the Topf Company, but also participated directly in the fulfillment of these orders. Is this rendition of your statements correct?

Answer: Yes, absolutely. Braun, as head of production at the company, not only knew about the orders from the SS construction management of the concentration camps that the company was fulfilling, but also participated directly in their fulfillment. For example, the factory managed by Braun manufactured individual parts and iron fittings for the cremation furnaces and ventilation systems, and on site, in the concentration camps, the fitters from the assembly department carried out the work on the construction and assembly of these furnaces and ventilation systems in the crematoria under his supervision. The reports from these fitters on the progress of the work went to Braun via the company boss.

Question: Did Braun personally go to concentration camps?

Answer: No, Braun did not visit the concentration camps.

Question: After returning from your trips to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, did you personally report to Braun or talk to him about the construction of the crematoria in the camp?

Answer: No, I never discussed these issues with Braun. I submitted the reports on my trips to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in connection with the construction of furnaces for the crematoria etc. directly to the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and he forwarded these reports to Braun for his information.

³¹¹ Max Schuchardt, head of the fitters' department (Montageabteilung).

Question: Who in the Topf Company was the authorized representative of counterintelligence, the counterintelligence representative?³¹²

Answer: I don't know exactly. The company employees felt and knew that they were being watched at every turn, and reported on everything to the counterintelligence and the security police, and they assumed that Ludwig Topf or Braun were dealing with this. I also suspected the latter.

The record of the interrogation was read to me in translation from Russian to German, my statements were transcribed correctly (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

9) Interrogation Protocol dated 15 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Deyerchun

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 12:45 and ended at 16:10.

Question: What equipment was manufactured in the factory of the Topf Company for the construction of the crematoria and gas chambers in the concentration camps?

Answer: In fulfilling the orders placed by the SS authorities for the construction and equipping of crematoria and gas chambers in the concentration camps (the latter, i.e. the equipping of the gas chambers, only took place in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp), the Topf Company purchased some materials and equipment from other companies, and manufactured some of them in its factory in Erfurt. In particular, the company's factory produced: small cast-iron doors, oven flaps, hearths and all the iron fittings for the incineration furnaces, as well as all individual parts, with the exception of the electric motors and ventilation equipment, which were installed in the crematoria (near the furnaces) and in the gas chambers.

³¹² The text has the transliterations "Абвега," Abwehr, and "Абвербеауфтрахтер," "Abwehrbeauftragter."

Fireclay,³¹³ bricks, insulation material, electric motors, electric elevators and other electrical equipment were purchased by the company from other German companies.

Question: Who in the management of the Topf Company placed the orders for the manufacture of the above-mentioned equipment in the company's factory?

Answer: The orders received from the SS authorities for the manufacture of one or other item of equipment were reviewed by the planning department and the head of production, and entered into the general production plan of the Topf Company. The order was then placed in the accounting department, and passed through the head of the design office to me or to engineer Schultze (depending on whether the order related to the construction of ventilation equipment or cremation furnaces). On the basis of this order, we drew up a detailed list of the individual parts and equipment to be manufactured, made the necessary drawings, and forwarded these documents via the preparation office to the company's production manager, Gustav Braun, who issued instructions to the factory workshops for the manufacture of these items of equipment, and checked the deadlines within which these items had to be manufactured and shipped to the customer.

Question: This means that Braun, as head of production at the Topf Company, was directly involved in fulfilling the orders placed by the SS authorities for the construction of crematoria in the concentration camps?

Answer: Absolutely correct. As head of production at Topf, Braun was kept informed of all orders placed by the SS authorities, and was directly involved in their fulfillment.

Question: You have been presented with documents confiscated from the management of the Topf Company, in which orders received by the company from the SS authorities for the manufacture of various equipment and materials and their delivery to the concentration camps are registered. Tell us what these documents are, and what part you personally, as well as Braun Gustav and Schultze Karl, played in their creation and production!

Answer: The documents printed on the white sheets of paper are sheets of Topf's production plans, which were drawn up by the general planning office with the participation of Gustav Braun, the company's head of production. In particular, Braun, together with the planning office, discussed the deadlines for the fulfillment of this or that order, and recorded them on the plan. Neither I personally nor engineer Schultze Karl were involved in drawing up these production plans for the company. The documents printed on green paper are copies of forms – orders with a detailed list of equipment or materials requested by one customer or another, in this case by the construction office of the concentration camps concerned. These documents were prepared by me or by Chief Engineer Schultze (this is noted on the first form) in four copies, one of which I forwarded to the production department, one to the bookkeeping department and one to the accounting department, while one remained in the files of the department I headed.

10) Interrogation Protocol dated 21 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Deyerchun

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 12:45 and ended at 16:10.

Question: You were presented with the organigram of the Topf and Sons Company together with a written explanation [see Docs. 4 and 5]. Tell me, do the mutual relationships you depicted on the diagram and the subordination of the various departments and offices to the company management, in particular the boss Ludwig Topf and the head of production Gustav Braun, correspond to reality?

Answer: Having looked again at the organigram of the Topf and Sons Company that I drew, I declare to the investigating authorities with full responsibility that the mutual relationships shown graphically on it and the subordination of the various departments and offices to the company management – i.e. the head Ludwig Topf and the head of production Gustav Braun – correspond to reality.

Question: On the diagram in question, you show that the preparatory department, the standardization and assembly departments, the materials warehouse and the shipping department were headed by the company's head of production, Gustav Braun. Do you maintain that this was really the case?

Answer: Yes, I maintain that. As I have shown on the diagram, the preparatory department, the standardization and assembly departments, the materials warehouse and the shipping department were headed by the company's head of production, Gustav Braun, and he directed their work.

Question: Specify which individual parts of the fittings and equipment for the crematoria and gas chambers built in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were manufactured by the Topf Company!

Answer: For the crematoria built in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp and other concentration camps, the Topf Company in Erfurt manufactured the following equipment and individual parts:

1. all iron and steel reinforcements (various bolts,³¹⁴ angle irons,³¹⁵ anchoring irons³¹⁶ etc.).

2. the cart-shaped devices for inserting the bodies.³¹⁷

3. cast-iron doors for the hearths,³¹⁸ slag pits,³¹⁹ muffles and grates. These individual parts of the incineration furnaces were cast in the factories of various German companies as semi-finished products, and then machined accordingly in the turning and metalworking shops of the Topf Company.

4. ventilation devices were made for the incineration furnaces and the equipment of the gas chambers (only in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp). The electric motors for these devices were ordered from other companies.

Question: Did the order forms sent to the workshops of the Topf Company for the manufacture of this or that piece of equipment indicate for whom this piece of equipment was to be manufactured?

Answer: Yes, this was indicated. In particular, it was noted in writing on every form relating to the manufacture, in the workshops of the Topf Company, of various individual parts and items of equipment for the incineration furnaces built in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and it was stated that the orderer of this item of equipment was the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. It was a general rule at the Question: Did the company's head of production, Braun Gustav, and other people in the production department or the workshops who reported to him know from these order forms for whom this or that item of equipment was being manufactured in the company's factory?

Answer: Quite right, both Braun G. as head of production and his subordinate managers knew from the order forms for whom they manufactured this or that piece of equipment in the company's factory. In particular, they knew that the company's workshops produced equipment and fittings for the incineration furnaces that were built in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp on the orders of the SS authorities.

11) Protocol of the Confrontation of Gustav Braun and Kurt Prüfer dated 25 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Kuzmishin [Кузьмишин], Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The confrontation started at 11:40 and ended at 18:30.

Question to the defendant Prüfer K: Report what you know about Gustav Braun's official activities and his participation in the work which the Topf Company carried out in the concentration camps in connection with the construction of the crematoria and the equipping of the gas chambers!

Answer: Gustav Braun worked in the Topf and Sons Company in the position of production manager, whereby he was extremely close to the company boss Ludwig Topf. He was directly subordinate to him in his work, and directed the company's entire production activities. It happened that Braun stood in for company boss Ludwig Topf when the latter and his brother Ernst Topf – who was co-owner of the company – traveled somewhere from Erfurt for a longer period of time. The following departments were subordinate to Gustav Braun as head of production: Topf's office and properties, preparatory department, assembly and standardization departments, shipping department, materials warehouse and operations. The Topf and Sons Company began building and equipping the crematoria in the concentration camps in 1940. The company received the orders for the above-mentioned work from the relevant SS authorities, more precisely from the SS construction offices of the concentration camps Buchenwald, Gross-Rosen, Mauthausen, Dachau and Auschwitz. These orders were incorporated into the company's general production plan, which was drawn up by the planning office with the participation of Braun Gustav. As head of production, Braun determined the deadlines for the fulfillment of these orders together with the planning office, depending on the company's production possibilities. In this way, he was always up to date on which SS authorities were accepting orders from the company and for which work, and he took the necessary measures to fulfill these orders on time. The Topf Company fulfilled these orders as follows: The necessary equipment, fittings and individual parts were manufactured in the company's factory, which the shipping department sent to the relevant concentration camp. Craftsmen from the assembly office and unskilled workers were also sent there to carry out the construction and assembly work in the crematoria on the spot, i.e. in the camp. This work was carried out with Braun's knowledge and on his instructions, as both the company factory and the assembly office as well as the shipping department were directly subordinate to him. As a rule, the Topf Company only built the incineration furnaces in the crematoria in the concentration camps I mentioned earlier; only in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp were four gas chambers³²⁰ set up in addition to the incineration furnaces for the crematoria. The factory of the Topf Company produced the following equipment and individual parts for the crematoria built in the concentration camps mentioned above: Anchors, ventilators, steel floors³²¹ for the hearths of the incinerators; furthermore, cast-iron doors for the furnaces and muffles as well as grates were made in the turning shop and the locksmith's shop of the factory.³²² Braun was in charge of the production of the individual parts and fittings listed, i.e. he directly supervised the work of the company factory.

Question to the defendant Braun: In what position did you work at Topf and Sons?

³²⁰ This contradicts Prüfer's statement during the interrogation dated 19 March 1946, repeated in that dated 11 March 1948, that Topf set up two "gas chambers at Auschwitz."

³²¹ In the Russian text сталные поды, stalnye pody, steel pipes, meaning the hearth grates (Planroste) consisting of square bars (Vierkantstäbe).

³²² Колосники, kolosniki, no doubt the furnaces' anchor bars (Verankerungs-Eisen).

Answer: I worked as head of production at Topf and Sons.

Question to the defendant Braun: Were you aware that the Topf and Sons Company carried out work for the construction and equipment of the crematoria in the concentration camps on the orders of the SS authorities?

Answer: I learned about this by chance in 1940 in a conversation with a fitter from the Topf Company, Heinrich Messing, who, when I asked him where he worked, replied that he was building cremation furnaces in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp together with Chief Engineer Prüfer. I found out about this a second time from workers in the shipping department under my command. This took place under the following circumstances: Once in 1940, when I entered the shipping department, I saw some SS men there. When I asked why they were there, the department head replied that they were conducting negotiations concerning the shipment of construction materials to the Buchenwald Concentration Camp. In that camp, Chief Engineer Prüfer was building a cremation furnace. As head of production, I was generally aware that the Topf and Sons Company manufactured incinerators, but I didn't know where and for what purpose, and I wasn't interested in this question.

Question to the defendant Prüfer: What would you like to say about the statements of the prisoner Braun Gustav?

Answer: Braun Gustav's statement that he did not know for whom and for what purposes the Topf and Sons Company had built incinerators does not correspond to reality. As head of production at the company, Braun was aware of this, and almost all the work involved in building the incinerators in the concentration camps was carried out with his knowledge. To substantiate this, I cite the following facts:

1. In 1940/1941, two cremation furnaces for the concentration camps Dachau and Mauthausen were assembled in the company's factory with the direct involvement of Braun Gustav. The place on the factory premises where these furnaces were assembled and where the workers were taken to carry out the assembly work on these furnaces had been personally selected by Braun. In addition, the individual parts (metal frames) and the fittings for these furnaces were manufactured in the factory workshops on Braun's instructions. After these incinerators had been assembled, they were shipped away from the factory on Braun's instructions – one to the Dachau Concentration Camp and one to the Mauthausen Concentration Camp.

2. In the fall of 1940 or spring of 1941 (I don't remember the exact date), the SS man von Hausen [transliterated] came to our company from Berlin to find out why a cremation furnace had not been produced on time, and to inspect the assembly of this furnace on the spot. In this context, company boss Ludwig Topf called a special meeting to discuss the construction of this furnace. In addition to Ludwig Topf and the SS man von Hausen, this meeting was also attended by Braun, who took part in the discussions about the deadlines for the construction of this cremation furnace for the SS men. On the instructions of the SS authorities in Berlin, the company also sent the furnace to the Mauthausen Concentration Camp.

3. As head of production at the company, Braun convened a meeting of the factory foremen every morning after breakfast, at which he laid down the work schedule with them for the day ahead. Braun not only knew that various individual parts and pieces of equipment for the cremation furnaces were being produced in the factory's workshops, which were built on the orders of the SS authorities in the concentration camps, but he also gave the factory foremen instructions on the production of these or those individual parts or pieces of equipment at the aforementioned meetings, as well as the deadlines set in each case.

4. In the fall of 1942, I spoke personally with Braun Gustav about the shipment of cremation furnaces for four or five crematoria (eight-muffle furnaces) to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, parts and individual blocks of which had been manufactured by order of the SS authorities in Berlin and were stored in the factory's warehouse. At the time, Braun put a worker at my disposal, with whom I checked whether the individual parts and blocks for these furnaces were available, and instructed the shipping department to send these cremation furnaces to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, which they did.

5. In the course of 1941 and 1942, I personally approached Braun several times as head of production on the question of sending skilled workers to the concentration camps Auschwitz and Buchenwald. These skilled workers were needed to carry out a range of work on the construction of the incineration furnaces in the concentration camps. In all these cases, Braun made a positive decision, and selected for me the specialists needed to carry out the work in the concentration camps Auschwitz and Buchenwald from among the workers working for him in the company.

6. Braun, as head of production at the company, devoted himself to all the details of the work in the company factory and in the departments and offices under his control. He took an interest in their work and supervised it, and therefore he could not possibly not know for whom which items of equipment were made in the factory, and to which address they were to be sent.

Question to the defendant Braun: The testimony of detainee Prüfer Kurt, which was given here in the face of a direct confrontation, proves beyond doubt that the work of the Topf Company in building and equipping crematoria in the concentration camps was carried out not only with your knowledge, but also with your direct participation. Please stop stubbornly denying this and make truthful statements.

Answer: The statements made here by the detainee Prüfer Kurt in the face of a direct confrontation do not correspond to reality, and I cannot confirm them. I declare once again to the investigating authority that, although I knew about the construction of cremation furnaces by the Topf and Sons Company, I did not know for whom and on what order it was carried out, and that I was not interested in it.

Question to the defendant Prüfer: Do you insist on your statements?

Answer: My statements about Gustav Braun's official activities and his involvement in the construction and equipping of crematoria in the concentration camps correspond to reality, and I fully insist on them.

Question to the defendant Braun: Do you have any questions for the inmate Prüfer?

Answer: No, I have no questions for inmate Prüfer.

Question to defendant Prüfer: Do you have any questions for inmate Braun?

Answer: I would like to ask Braun two questions:

1. Does Braun remember the following incident: in the summer or fall of 1942, we received the second order from the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp for the delivery of five triple-muffle furnaces for Crematorium III in Birkenau. As there was no indication on this order of the urgency and sequence of execution, I met Braun in the company office, informed him and showed him the order. Braun then went with me to the head of the general planning office, Mersch, with whom we agreed on the matter in question. On the way to Mersch, Braun asked me the following question, or rather said jokingly: "Kids, who else are you going to burn?" I responded with a joke of my own.

2. Does Braun remember the incident when an SS officer from Berlin came to his company in the spring of 1942 to discuss the construction of new cremation furnaces for the SS? On this occasion, company boss Ludwig Topf convened a meeting at his premises, which was attended by Braun, the head of the planning office Mersch and the SS man. At this meeting, it was made clear that at that time the company was busy fulfilling urgent orders for the manufacture of spare parts for war planes, and could no longer accept new orders from the SS authorities for the construction of cremation furnaces.

Answer of the defendant Braun: I do not remember any such incidents.

The minutes of the confrontation were read to us in German translation, our statements were transcribed correctly (Kurt Prüfer, Braun).

Confrontation conducted by:

The head of the 2nd [sub]section of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Kuzmishin

The operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed: Doperchuk).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Minister of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Kush.

12) Interrogation Protocol dated 4 March 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk, Lieutenant Colonel Novikov [НОВИКОВ]

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 12:15 and ended at 18:20.

Question: What work was carried out by the Topf Company in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and what part did you yourself play in carrying out this work?

Answer: In fulfillment of the orders it had received from the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, the Topf and Sons Company carried out work in the course of the years 1940 to 1946 [sic; obviously a transcription error] in the said camp in the construction of cremation furnaces, disinfestation facilities, but also in the assembly of ventilation equipment for the cremation furnaces and gas chambers. All this work was carried out by the company with my direct involvement, and proceeded in the following order:

The first crematorium in the Auschwitz Camp was built in the second half of 1940 in the camp section Auschwitz [Main Camp]. The crematorium was an old, semi-underground room made of reinforced concrete with an area of 80 m², which had been built by the Poles as an artillery depot or air-raid shelter.

Initially, the company Topf and Sons built a double-muffle incinerator in the crematorium in question, and then – in early 1941 – the SS Construction Office of Auschwitz raised the question of increasing the capacity of this crematorium with the company, after which another double-muffle incinerator was installed there at my suggestion. In addition, at my personal suggestion, a blower was installed for these two furnaces, thanks to which the draft in the furnaces was increased,³²³ and the incineration accelerated, which also increased the capacity of the incineration furnaces. The drawings and technical plans for this blower were prepared by chief engineer Karl Schultze, and the assembly work for its installation was carried out on Schultze's instructions by a company fitter who traveled to the Auschwitz Camp especially for this purpose. I personally drew up technical plans and drawings for the cremation furnaces mentioned above, and also carried out the technical supervision of the work on their construction. In the spring or summer of 1942, the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Camp accelerated work on the construction of four new, large crematoria in the camp sector Birkenau, which were assigned the numbers 2, 3, 4 and 5. The old crematorium in the Auschwitz Camp sector was listed as number 1.

The crematoria in Birkenau were completed and put into operation between February and April 1943.³²⁴ They were equipped with state-of-the-art technology,³²⁵ and literally proved to be death factories according to their purpose in the camp. This was particularly true of the second and third crematoria, which were equipped by the Topf Company in accordance with the requirements of the central construction office.

In the buildings of these crematoria, gas chambers were set up which looked like shower facilities and baths, and in which the SS men murdered prisoners in groups. Their bodies were then transported to the cremation furnaces by special electric elevators (lifts) and incinerated.

In addition, special rooms were set up there [inside the crematoria] for the operating personnel recruited from among the prisoners, as well as medical cabinets, where the autopsies of the corpses took place, and morgue rooms [мертвецкие, mertvetskie], in which the corpses of those tortured to death in the gas chambers were piled up, because although the crematoria were in operation 24 hours a day [круглосуточную, kruglosutochno], they were unable to burn them [the corpses].

³²³ The “Saugzug-Anlage” (forced-draft device) is also called “Zugverstärkungs-Anlage” in the documents (draft-enhancer device).

³²⁴ Recte: officially between 19 March and 25 June 1943.

³²⁵ A reckless claim, to say the least: the Topf cremation furnaces for concentration camps were cheap and economical, but much less solid and rather crude compared to the furnaces for civilian crematoria.

In the second and third crematoria of Birkenau, the Topf Company built five three-muffle furnaces each (a muffle is an opening for introducing the corpses into the furnace); electric elevators (lifts) were built to transport the corpses to the furnaces, and ventilation devices were also manufactured and installed in the gas chambers, the furnace rooms and the morgues [и в мертвецких, i v mertvetskikh].

In the fourth and fifth crematorium, only cremation furnaces were built by the Topf Company, four two-muffle furnaces in each crematorium.³²⁶ There were also gas chambers in these crematoria, but the Topf Company did not concern itself with their equipment, and to my knowledge, they did not possess any ventilation system.

At the end of 1943, the Topf Company built a large disinfection facility about 100 meters from the area where the gas chambers were located, in which the disinfection of the clothing and laundry of the prisoners arriving at the camp was carried out [the Zentralsauna].

In addition, the company built special furnaces for the incineration of waste near crematoria 2 and 3 [waste-incineration furnaces].

In this way, the Topf Company built a total of 20 cremation furnaces in 5 crematoria in the concentration camp, a disinfection facility with two furnaces, two special furnaces for waste incineration; electric elevators (lifts) were installed in two crematoria to transport the corpses from the gas chambers (morgues) to the cremation furnaces, and ventilation devices were made to suck in and expel air in four [sic!] gas chambers at the [pri] second and third crematorium.

In addition, ventilation equipment and blowers were manufactured and installed in the morgues and in the furnace rooms of the first, second and third crematorium.

All this work, with the exception of the installation of the ventilation equipment, was carried out in the warehouse by the company's fitters under my direct supervision and control.

As a specialist in cremation equipment and a person of trust to the head of the company, I checked the accuracy of the crematorium drawings that had been submitted to the company by the SS construction office for review and technical advice. I prepared drawings and technical plans of the cremation furnaces built in these crematoria, and also traveled to the ³²⁶ Recte: two 4-muffle furnaces. The 8-muffle furnace consisted of two groups of 4-muffles connected by four interposed gas generators. Each group consisted of two pairs of single-muffle furnaces conforming to drawing D 51173 arranged in reverse, so that each pair shared the rear and center walls. See Mattogno/Deana, Vol. II, Docs. 163a-c, pp. 263f., and Doc. 238-240, pp. 401f.

Auschwitz Concentration Camp from time to time, and conducted negotiations there with the construction office on all questions concerning the construction of the cremation furnaces and the equipment of the crematoria, including the equipping of the gas chambers with ventilation systems.

The practical work involved in preparing the technical plans and drawings for these facilities, as well as their assembly on site – in the camp – was carried out under the direction and with the direct involvement of the chief engineer of the Topf construction department, Karl Schultze.

Question: You previously testified that two double-muffle incineration furnaces were built by the Topf Company in Crematorium I in the camp sector Auschwitz, whereas an official report by the SS construction office of Auschwitz dated 28 June 1943, a photocopy of which you have, states that three double-muffle furnaces were installed in that crematorium. Please make a statement on this.

Answer: I now recall that in Crematorium No. 1, which was located in the Auschwitz camp sector, not two but three cremation furnaces were installed by the Topf Company with my participation, i.e. the situation is as described in the report submitted to me by the construction office. In connection with this, I would like to clarify that the Topf Company built a total of 21, not 20, cremation furnaces in five crematoria at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

By the way, I would like to clarify the following question: On the photocopy of the SS construction office report that I have been given, it says that there were eight-muffle cremation furnaces in Crematoria 4 and 5 at Birkenau. In reality, four two-muffle furnaces were built in each of these crematoria by the Topf Company, but as they had been combined into a square block at my suggestion, they were considered to be an eight-muffle furnaces in practice. The necessity to combine these furnaces into one block arose from the fact that the furnace rooms in Crematoria no. 4 and no. 5 were considerably smaller than in the other crematoria, and it was not possible to install four furnaces individually in them.

Question: Was there a gas chamber at Crematorium No. 1 in the camp sector Auschwitz?

Answer: Yes, there was one.

Question: Who set up this gas chamber?

Answer: I don't know exactly, but I assume that the gas chamber at the first crematorium in Auschwitz was set up by the Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp itself.

Question: When and how did you find out that there was a gas chamber at the first crematorium in Auschwitz?

Answer: I learned about it by chance in 1942 under the following circumstances: In the spring of 1942, at the request of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp, I traveled to Auschwitz to review the project for the planned construction of a new crematorium in the Auschwitz camp sector, to present my conclusions, and also to visit the site where the construction of this crematorium was planned. I visited the planned construction site accompanied by an SS man. As we passed the first crematorium, I looked through the half-open door into one of the rooms of the crematorium building, and saw human corpses lying on the floor in various positions. There were more than ten of them. As I approached this room, someone quickly slammed the door from the inside. As I did not know the purpose of this room in Crematorium No. 1, I asked the SS man accompanying me about it. The latter replied that a gas chamber had been set up in this room, and that prisoners were being poisoned with gas there. To my subsequent question as to how this gas chamber worked, the SS man replied evasively that he did not know exactly, but he told me that he knew that there were gas chambers in the city of Łódź where the SS men killed prisoners with exhaust fumes from car engines, but then they had made improvements to speed up the killing process, and started using some kind of gas. As the SS man explained, the killing process was shortened from 10 to 15 minutes to one to two minutes as a result of the use of gases in the Łódź gas chambers. According to the SS man, the killing process in the Łódź gas chambers was as follows: the prisoners were chased into the gas chambers, the doors were hermetically sealed, and then bottles of gas were thrown through special openings. Based on this account, I concluded that the prisoners were also murdered in the same way in the gas chamber built by the SS men at Crematorium No. 1 in Auschwitz.

Question: So from spring 1942, you were informed about the existence of gas chambers [plural] at the crematoria [plural] of the Auschwitz Camp?

Answer: Quite right. As I have already explained, I first became aware in the spring of 1942 that there was a gas chamber [singular] at Crematorium No. 1 in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and that prisoners were murdered there by the SS men in a violent manner.

Question: Then why did you state during the earlier interrogations that you first learned in 1943 of the real purpose of the crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: I simply got the date wrong in my statements in the earlier interrogations. In reality, as I said before, I became aware of this in the spring of 1942.

Question: Thus, the investigating authority states that, although you knew from the beginning of 1942 that the crematoria and the gas chambers in the Auschwitz Camp were intended and used by the SS men for the mass extermination of completely innocent people, you continued until 1944 to direct the work on the construction and equipment of the gas chambers in the said camp, and also actively raised and solved questions concerning their technical equipment, perfecting and increasing their capacity.

Answer: I have no objection to the facts I have just stated, as they all correspond to reality, with the exception of my involvement in equipping the gas chambers. Although I knew from the beginning of 1942 that the crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Camp were intended and used by the SS men for the mass extermination of prisoners, I continued until 1944 to supervise and direct the work of building and equipping new crematoria in the Birkenau Camp sector, and I also actively raised and solved questions concerning their technical equipment, perfecting and increasing their capacity. As far as the gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp are concerned, it was not I who dealt with their equipment, but the chief engineer of the Topf and Sons Company, Karl Schultze. He personally and under his direct supervision set up four gas chambers in the camp sector near Crematoria no. 2 and no. 3. I personally only conducted general negotiations with the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Camp about the possibility of manufacturing equipment for the so-called “special baths” (the SS men used this camouflage term to describe the gas chambers, which I later learned).

Question: You are shown a photocopy of a letter with your signature dated 2 March 1943, addressed to the SS construction office of Auschwitz, and concerning ten gas testers. Explain for what purpose you were looking for these gas testers on behalf of the SS authorities!

Answer: At the request of the head of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp von Bischoff [sic], I searched for gas testers as mentioned in the photocopy of my letter to the aforementioned Construction Office dated 2 March 1943, in order to equip the gas chambers in the camp crematoria with them. When von Bischoff approached me with this request, he explained to me that, after the poisoning of prisoners in the gas chambers, there were often cases where hydrogen-cyanide vapors remained in them even after they had been ventilated, which led to the poisoning of the operating personnel working in these chambers. That is why von Bischoff asked me to find out which companies manufactured gas testers that could be used to measure the concentration of hydrogen-cyanide vapors in the gas chambers in order to make the work of the operating personnel safe. I was unable to fulfill von Bischoff's request, because I could not find any company that manufactured such gas testers.

Question: The photocopy of the letter of 2 March 1943, which was presented to you, as well as your reply, essentially demonstrate that you took a very active part in the work of setting up the gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. Why did you try to deny this fact beforehand?

Answer: I only denied beforehand that I took part directly in the work of installing the ventilation equipment in the gas chambers. I do not deny that I was generally involved in equipping [в оборудовании, v oborudovanyi] these chambers with other objects, in particular with gas testers [газизмерител (gazizmeritel) = gas meter].

The record of the interrogation was read to me in German translation, my statements are transcribed correctly (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

The operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Deyerchun (signed: Deyerchun).

Military Prosecutor of the USSR Supreme Court Guard Lieutenant Colonel Justice Novikov (signed: Novikov).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush (signed: Kush).

13) Interrogation Protocol dated 9 March 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 13:10 and ended at 17:35.

Question: Do you stand by the statements you made during the interrogations prior to your transfer to Moscow?

Answer: The statements I made during the interrogations prior to my transfer to Moscow correspond to reality, and I stand by them.

Question: Explain in which concentration camps the Topf and Sons Company worked on the construction and equipment of crematoria and gas chambers!

Answer: As I have already explained during the investigation, the Topf and Sons Company was involved in the construction and equipping of crematoria in concentration camps in the period from 1940 to 1944. During this period, the company built and equipped crematoria in the following concentration camps: Buchenwald, Mauthausen, Dachau, Gross-Rosen and Auschwitz. Gas chambers were only set up in the Auschwitz death camp.

Question: The documents seized from the Topf and Sons Company and made available to the investigating authority show that work on the construction and equipment of crematoria was also carried out by this company in the concentration camps Elrich, Sachsenhausen, Lublin and Stutthof. Why are you trying to conceal this in the investigation?

Answer: The Topf and Sons Company did not carry out any work in the concentration camps mentioned above. I only know that our company sent so-called fireclay markers on the order of the management of the Stutthof Concentration Camp, which were placed in the urns with the ashes after the bodies had been cremated. I don't know for what purposes these fireclay stamps were used by the SS management of the camp.

Question: You have been shown extracts from the company's general production plan, which show that the Topf Company sent various materials to the concentration camps listed above for the construction of crematoria. Please comment on this!

Answer: As can be seen from the excerpts of the general production plan of the Topf and Sons Company that I have been given, at various times fireclay stamps were sent to the concentration camps Sachsenhausen, Lublin and Stutthof, which had been ordered by the SS management of the aforementioned camps. I do not know what these stamps were used for. As far as the delivery of spare parts for the cremation furnaces of the Elrich Concentration Camp by our company is concerned, which took place in March 1945, I also know nothing about it, because during this period I was in charge of the construction of barracks in the village of Bischleben for the Topf Company, and this order was not compiled by me.

Question: For what purposes did the Topf and Sons Company manufacture powerful ventilation equipment for sucking in and expelling air and deliver it to the Buchenwald Concentration Camp?

Answer: There was a large military factory on the site of the concentration camp in question where anti-aircraft guns were manufactured and where prisoners worked. These guns were tested and fired in a closed firing range where, under the supervision of Chief Engineer Schultze, ventilation equipment was also installed, which had been manufactured in our company's factory by order of the SS management of the Buchenwald Camp.

Question: Were there gas chambers in this camp?

Answer: I don't know anything about that.

Question: Did you personally go to the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp?

Answer: I went to the concentration camp mentioned twice in 1941/1942.

Question: On what matter?

Answer: In connection with the construction of the crematorium. The first time I went there at the invitation of the SS construction office of the aforementioned camp to give technical advice on the project to build a crematorium, and to select the site where this crematorium was to be erected. The second time I went there was to check the progress of the work on the construction of this crematorium. The Topf Company built a crematorium with a triple-muffle furnace in the camp in question with my direct involvement.

Question: It is known that not one but two cremation furnaces were built in the camp crematorium of Gross-Rosen. Why did you fail to mention this during the investigation?

Answer: Because it was a long time ago, I can't remember exactly how many furnaces were built in this crematorium, but it seems to me that only one furnace was installed there.

Question: You have been shown a drawing of the crematorium built by the Topf Company in the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp. This drawing shows that two cremation furnaces were installed in this crematorium. Please provide truthful information on the matter!

Answer: Having seen the drawing presented to me, I cannot but agree, or rather confess, that two triple-muffle furnaces were built in the camp crematorium at Gross-Rosen with my direct involvement.

Question: Who drew up the project for the crematorium at Gross-Rosen, the drawing of which was submitted to you?

Answer: The project of the crematorium for the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp, the drawing of which is now being presented to me, was drawn up by me personally.

Question: Were there gas chambers in this crematorium?

Answer: During the period in which I traveled to the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp, there were no gas chambers at the camp crematorium. I do not know whether any were set up there later.

Question: Two drawings of crematoria built by Topf and Sons in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp have been confiscated from the company's archives. Who drew up the projects for these crematoria?

Answer: The two documents presented to me are drawings of Crematoria No. 2 and No. 4 at Birkenau, which were built and equipped by the Topf Company in the Birkenau sector of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. These drawings were prepared by the SS construction office of the said camp, and sent to the company to check the accuracy of the technical plans, and to make calculations regarding the quantity of materials required to build these crematoria. The work shown on these drawings was carried out by me personally and by Chief Engineer Schultze.

Question: Did you personally take part in the testing of the cremation furnaces and the commissioning of the crematoria built under your leadership in Auschwitz?

Answer: I did not have to take part in the testing of the cremation furnaces, or the commissioning of the crematoria built under my leadership in Auschwitz. This was done by fitters from the company who carried out the construction and assembly work in these crematoria under my supervision. During the trips to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I personally observed and checked the functioning of the cremation furnaces at a time when they were already in operation. At the time of these trips, the bodies of prisoners who had been murdered by the SS men in the gas chambers were cremated in my presence.

Once, probably in the spring of 1943, I went to Auschwitz at the invitation of the SS Construction Office to find out why the blowers near the furnaces of the 2nd crematorium were not working. Chief Engineer Schultze also went there to carry out the necessary repairs to these blowers and put them back into operation. Schultze did not succeed in repairing these blowers, and we were forced to dismantle them. But when we, meaning myself and Schultze, checked the functioning of the cremation furnaces without these blowers, around 25 bodies of inmates who, as Schultze told me, had been poisoned in the gas chamber, were cremated in our presence.

Question: Were prisoners murdered in the gas chambers of Auschwitz in your presence?

Answer: No, I myself did not have to be personally present when prisoners were poisoned in the gas chambers at Auschwitz. The fact that prisoners were murdered in these gas chambers with hydrogen-cyanide vapors was communicated to me by the head of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp, von Bischoff [sic], at whose request I corresponded with several German companies regarding the ordering of gas testers to equip [для оборудования, dlya oborudovaniya] the gas chambers.

The record of the interrogation was read to me in German translation, my statements are transcribed correctly (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

Interrogated by: the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Deyerchun (signed: Deyerchun).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush (signed: Kush).

14) Interrogation Protocol dated 13 March 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Kush

The interrogation started at 12:10 and ended at 17:20.

Question: What was the camouflage term for gas chambers on the drawings and documents in the correspondence between the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp and your company?

Answer: On the drawings of the crematoria and in the official correspondence between the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp and the Topf and Sons Company, the gas chambers bore the camouflage designation “corpse chambers,”³²⁷ “special basements,”³²⁸ “bathing establishments for special operations,”³²⁹ etc.

Question: At a meeting with the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp, which took place on 19 August 1942, the question of the installation of two three-muffle furnaces in the “bathing facilities for special operations” was discussed with you. Explain which “bathing facilities for special operations” were discussed at this meeting!

Answer: This meeting was about the installation of two three-muffle furnaces near the gas chambers that had been built by the SS men in Birkenau, completely separate from the crematoria built in that sector of the camp. I don’t know exactly where these gas chambers were, because I was never in the area where they were located and never saw them. Based on the statements of a prisoner who worked as chief stoker of the crematoria in Auschwitz, I know that these gas chambers were three kilometers away from the Birkenau crematoria, and that the bodies of the prisoners murdered with gas in them were cremated on pyres. I would like to add to these statements by saying that no cremation furnaces were built near these gas chambers.

Question: At the aforementioned meeting, did you propose that the cremation furnaces intended for Mogilev be made available for this purpose [for the “bathrooms”]? Which crematoria for Mogilev did you bring up at this meeting?

Answer: In the first half of 1942,³³⁰ the Topf and Sons Company received an order from the SS Central Office³³¹ in Berlin for the manufacture of four eight-muffle cremation furnaces for the city of Mogilev. These furnaces were manufactured by the company and sent to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp instead of Mogilev on instructions of the SS Office. At that time, when the question of the installation of two cremation furnaces at the “bathing establishments for special operations” was raised at the aforementioned meeting, I suggested that the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Camp should coordinate the question with the corresponding SS office in Berlin, and take over some of these furnaces for their needs in Auschwitz, because they had already been built and were in the company factory at that time. This decision was subsequently made. However, these furnaces were not installed in the “bathing establishments for special operations”, but in the newly built Crematoria No. 4 and No. 5. Another of these furnaces destined for Mogilev was sent to the Krakow railroad station on the instructions of the SS, and I don’t know what happened to it there. One furnace remained in the Topf Company’s warehouse, and was not shipped anywhere until the day Germany surrendered.

Question: For what purpose and on whose behalf did you draw up the report on the state of construction of the crematoria in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in January 1943? A copy of this report will be presented to you.

Answer: The plan in question was drawn up by me at the request of the head of the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Camp, von Bischoff, for an accountability report to the SS Main Office,³³² which was extremely interested in the pace of crematorium construction in Auschwitz, and demanded that the work on equipping and commissioning them be accelerated. Based on Bischoff’s statements, I know that Himmler was to visit the Auschwitz death camp in April 1943. Everything was therefore done to complete the construction of the crematoria, and to put them into operation by that date.

The record of the interrogation was read to me in German translation, my statements are transcribed correctly (signed: Kurt Prüfer).

Interrogated by: the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Minister of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed: Doperchuk).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Minister of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush (signed: Kush).

15) Handwritten Deposition dated 19 February 1948

The following document is a handwritten statement penned down by Kurt Prüfer on 19 February 1948 to clarify Gustav Braun's corporate responsibilities (see Doc. 11). The text is divided into six points that have no strict logical and syntactical connection. In the translation, I preserve all the ambiguities it presents.

I, Kurt Prüfer, was employed as a senior engineer in the furnace-construction department at the company F.A. Topf and Sons, Erfurt, and had the following business matter to discuss and deal with on behalf of the gentlemen with Mr. Braun, Director of Operations.

1) Provision of helpers and locksmiths [sic] in 1940, helpers for the Auschwitz construction site, as well as in 1942 and 1943 (spring).

2) Furthermore, the complaints of the fitters about mismatched iron parts, which came to the construction site either due to an incorrect shipment or drawing, were discussed and the source of the error was determined and corrected. These discussions were usually preceded by a written report prepared by Mr. Braun and submitted to the Topf brothers. As I remember, in the fall of 42 and spring of 43 concerning the Ausschwitz [sic] construction site and the Mauthausen construction site.

3) For the production of fireclay bridges for the muffles of the furnaces, which were generally produced at the Erfurt plant using the fireclay mass "Monolith", a discussion took place with Mr. Braun about the production site of the bridges, as well as about the worker who carried out the production. These replacement parts were made on an ongoing basis. So in 1942, and '43, via the Auschwitz and Dachau camps.

4) Since during the war our rich stock of iron was almost depleted, and the usual types of iron such as U, angle, T, I double T and flat iron were not always available, it was necessary to discuss with Mr. Braun which iron could be taken that was in stock and not used for other commissions. These questions were mainly concrete in the years fall of '42 and spring of '43.

5) Questions regarding deadlines were also settled with Mr. Braun, autumn '42 and spring '43.

6) Since I received the order from Mr. Topf in 1944 to build four residential buildings (smaller ones) on a lot outside the factory property, or to take over the construction management, four questions had to be settled with Mr. Braun.

- a) Provision of the scaffolding required for construction.
- b) Provision of factory bricklayers, helpers and carpenters.
- c) What supplies of materials can be taken from the factory.
- d) Provision of wagons to transport the materials to the building site.
- e) Catering for the workers employed on the construction site from the factory kitchen.

II) INTERROGATIONS OF KARL SCHULTZE

1) Interrogation Protocol dated 4 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Shatunovsky, Major Moruzhenko

Interpreter: Negnevitski

On 4 March 1946, I, head of the 2nd section of the counterintelligence service "Smersh" of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Shatunovsky and deputy head of the 2nd Section of the Guard Major Moruzhenko, interrogated as a detainee

Schultze, Karl, son of Karl, born in 1900, from Berlin, son of the owner of a sugar mill, clerk, with higher education, German, German citizen, residing in Erfurt, Rudolstädterstrasse 3e.

Question: Since when and in what position have you been working for Topf?

Answer: I have been working as a civil engineer for ventilation equipment at the Topf Company in Erfurt since 1928.

Question: Tell us what you know about the design and construction of crematoria for the concentration camps!

Answer: In 1940, the SS management of the Buchenwald Concentration Camp explained that the crematorium in the town of Weimar was not sufficient for the camp. The corpses from Buchenwald had to be brought to Weimar, and therefore the demand was made to build a crematorium directly on the territory of the concentration camp. The design and construction of this crematorium was assigned to the Topf Company by the Reichsführer SS/Construction Department. This work was carried out directly by the chief engineer of the Topf Company, Prüfer Kurt, both in terms of design and construction. As a ventilation engineer, I was called in by Prüfer to design and install the ventilation equipment³³³ for the cremation furnaces. Together with Prüfer, I also designed and built the crematoria in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in this way in 1942/1943. I only built the part of the crematorium that was used for ventilation. Four crematoria were built in this camp during the period mentioned above. There were five furnaces in each of the two crematoria, and three corpses were placed in each furnace, i.e. there were three openings (muffles) in each furnace. Within one hour, fifteen corpses could be cremated in a crematorium with five furnaces.

Question: What was the difference between the construction of the crematoria set up in concentration camps and ordinary crematoria set up by the company in various cities until 1933?

Answer: In the ordinary crematoria there was only one large opening (muffle) into which a coffin with a corpse could be inserted without difficulty. In the crematoria of the concentration camps there was not one opening in each furnace, but three, and five furnaces in one crematorium. In this way, there were fifteen openings (muffles) in a concentration-camp crematorium instead of just one, as in an ordinary crematorium. In an ordinary crematorium, the corpse in the coffin was pushed into the opening by means of a movable cart on rollers, but in the concentration-camp crematoria, the corpse was introduced into the muffle on a hand-carried stretcher. The power of the ventilators in the ventilation systems of the concentration-camp crematoria was 5-6 hp instead of three hp as in the furnace of an ordinary crematorium.

Question: Apart from ventilation systems for the crematoria in the concentration camps, what other devices did you install?

Answer: On the orders of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I installed ventilation equipment in the so-called “shower baths” [бани-душевые, bani-dushevye] in these camps [plural] in 1942-1943. In reality, this ventilation was constructed and installed by me in the gas chambers.

³³³ Вентиляционных установок, ventilyatsionnykh ustanovok,” here the pressured-air blowers (Druckluft-Anlagen).

Question: When did you personally go to the Auschwitz Camp to equip the crematoria and gas chambers?

Answer: I was twice in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. Once in connection with a calculation error for the ventilation – this was in the spring of 1943 – and the second time about two months later to put the ventilation inside a newly built crematorium into operation.

Question: What did you notice during your stay in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp while you were in the immediate vicinity of the crematorium and the gas chambers?

Answer: When I was in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I personally saw SS men from the camp herding up to three hundred people in front of me – men, women and children; I could hardly tell what nationality they were, but judging by outward appearances they had no idea where they were being led. They were all herded into a large wooden barracks without windows, which was electrically lit on the inside. From the outside, this barracks was connected to the gas chamber by a closed corridor, where I installed the ventilation. I observed this at about 4 pm. The following day at ten o'clock in the morning, I was in the crematorium, and saw sixty corpses of men, women and children of various ages. They were lying undressed on the floor, ready to be put into the cremation furnace. Judging by their appearance, they had been murdered in the gas chamber.

Question: Tell us about the interior of the gas chamber!

Answer: This building was eight meters wide and thirteen meters long. It was completely empty inside. The height of the building inside was 2.6 meters. There were four square openings measuring 25 x 25 cm in the ceiling. The ventilation system exchanged air ten times [per hour], and was used to suck out the gas that had accumulated, and pump in fresh air. The ventilation pipes, which I personally designed for the gas chamber, were bricked into the walls of the chamber.

Question: Who did you talk to about the fact that the crematoria and gas chambers you designed and built were used to exterminate completely innocent people?

Answer: I want to make this clear. The designer of the cremation furnaces, Prüfer, was on a business trip to Auschwitz. When he arrived in the morning, he also saw the sixty corpses of men, women and children lying on the ground. I told him everything that had happened: how these people had been brought in, chased into the gas chambers [plural] and killed, and how their bodies were now being burned in the crematorium. Prüfer didn't respond to me on this.

Question: After you personally and Prüfer had witnessed the murder of innocent people, how many more crematoria and gas chambers for the concentration camps did you build?

Answer: After I had observed how innocent people were exterminated in the gas chambers and crematoria in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I set up five more cremation furnaces there, in Auschwitz, together with Prüfer, and equipped one gas chamber with a ventilation system.

Question: What motivated you to spend seven days in Auschwitz on this business trip?

Answer: I stayed there for five days, because there was no transport with people destined for extermination, but I had to test the function of the cremation furnace in practice. I was only able to carry out this test when the aforementioned up to three hundred people arrived, who were then murdered in the gas chambers [plural].

Question: When and by whom were the mobile crematoria constructed, and for what purpose?

Answer: The mobile crematoria were constructed as follows: The same [furnace] type as in Buchenwald, but they were modified by Prüfer so that they could be mounted on a truck, and they used oil as fuel. Their purpose is unknown to me. One such furnace constructed by Prüfer was sent to Berlin. I don't know to which organization, Prüfer knows about that.

Question: When did you, together with Prüfer, knowingly design, perfect and build crematoria and gas chambers for the extermination of people?

Answer: Together with Chief Engineer Prüfer, I knowingly built, designed and perfected crematoria and equipped gas chambers from 1943 onwards, i.e. from the time when I personally observed the murder of people in the gas chambers and crematoria in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: What motivated you to continue building your constructions in Auschwitz after you had seen their purpose with Prüfer?

Answer: I and Prüfer continued to build crematoria and gas chambers because we had bound ourselves to the SS with our signature in 1942, and were committed to the Topf Company and the National-Socialist state.

My statements were transcribed accurately, they were read to me in German translation, and I signed them (signed: Schultze).

Interrogated by: The head of the 2nd section of the counterintelligence service "Smersh" of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Shatunovsky (signed: Shatunovsky).

The deputy head of the 2nd section of the Guard Major Moruzhenko (signed: Moruzhenko).

2) Interrogation Protocol dated 7 March 1946

Interrogator: Malyschko

Interpreter: Negnevitski

I, head of the 2nd section of the counterintelligence service “Smersh” of the 8th Guards Army, Lt. Malyschko, interrogated the detainee

Schultze, Karl, son of Karl, born in 1900, from Berlin, son of the owner of a sugar mill, clerk, mechanical engineer, German, German citizen, resident of Erfurt.

Question: Where does your family currently live?

Answer: My wife lives in Erfurt at Rudolstädterstraße 3.

Question: What specialist training do you have?

Answer: I graduated from the Mechanical Engineering Institute in Berlin in 1922, where I obtained an engineering diploma.

[The interrogation consisted only of these two questions.]

3) Interrogation Protocol dated 14 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk

On 14 March 1946, I, investigating judge of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guards Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi, on this day questioned the detainee

Schultze, Karl, son of Karl, born in 1900, native of Berlin, son of the owner of a sugar mill, German citizen, resident of Erfurt, of intermediate technical education.

The interrogation began at 10:15 a.m.

The interrogation was conducted through interpreter Datsyuk, who was warned against unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic.

Question: Which political parties and organizations did you belong to?

Answer: I didn’t belong to any parties. But I was a member of the National-Socialist organization “Labor Front.” I joined this organization in 1933.

Question: What leading positions did you hold in this organization?

Answer: During the entire time I was a member of the National-Socialist “Labor Front” organization, I did not hold any leading positions in it.

Question: When did you start working for the Topf Company in Erfurt?

Answer: I started working in the factory of the Topf Company in Erfurt in 1928.

Question: What position did you hold there?

Answer: I was chief engineer for the construction of ventilation systems at the Topf Company.

Question: What kind of buildings did you design the ventilation systems for?

Answer: I designed ventilation systems for theaters, factory heating boilers and crematoria.

Question: Did you also design ventilation systems for the gas chambers in the concentration camps?

Answer: Yes, I also designed ventilation systems for the gas chambers in the concentration camps.

Question: When did you start designing ventilation systems for the gas chambers in the concentration camps?

Answer: I only designed two ventilation systems for two gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp once, in 1943.

Question: Under whose direction did the Topf Company build the ventilation systems for the gas chambers that you designed?

Answer: The construction of the ventilation systems was carried out under my leadership.

Question: From whom did the Topf Company receive orders for the construction of the ventilation equipment for the gas chambers?

Answer: As far as I know, the Topf Company received the orders for the construction of ventilation equipment for the gas chambers, as well as the crematoria for the concentration camps, from the SS leadership in Berlin, Construction Department.

Question: Who in the Topf Company was involved in the design and construction of crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: The chief engineer of the department crematorium construction, Prüfer Kurt, was responsible for the construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps, and for managing the construction of these crematoria in the factory of the Topf Company.

Question: What was your part in the construction of the crematoria?

Answer: My part in the construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps consisted of designing and installing ventilation equipment³³⁴ for the cremation furnaces as a ventilation engineer.

³³⁴ Вентиляционные установки, ventilyatsionnye ustanovki.

Question: For which concentration camps did you design and build ventilation systems for the gas chambers as well as ventilation systems and blowers³³⁵ for the crematoria?

Answer: As I mentioned earlier, I only designed and built two ventilation systems for two gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and blowers for the crematorium in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp. It is possible that I also designed and built ventilation systems and blowers for other concentration camps, but I can no longer remember when and for which camps.

Question: How many crematoria were built by the Topf Company in total?

Answer: I can't answer this question because I don't know.

Question: What part did Braun and Sander play in the construction of the crematoria?

Answer: Braun, as head of production in the factory of the Topf Company, managed the construction of the crematoria, and made sure that the orders were carried out to the highest quality and on time. Sander, as chief engineer at Topf, was in charge of the department crematorium construction. Sander personally checked and approved all crematorium projects designed by engineer Prüfer, and then submitted them to company owner Ludwig Topf for approval.

Question: When did you become aware that innocent people were being exterminated in the crematoria you built together with Prüfer, and with the help of the ventilation systems you built for the gas chambers in the concentration camps?

Answer: I knew that people who had been interned in the concentration camps and murdered in the gas chambers were burned in the crematoria from the moment I personally saw people murdered in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: When were you in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: I was in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp at the beginning of 1943, I don't remember the exact month.

Question: How often did you go to this camp?

Answer: I went to Auschwitz Concentration Camp twice,³³⁶ both times in 1943.

Question: For what purpose did you go there?

Answer: The first time I went to Auschwitz in order to correct the mistakes made when calculating the ventilation for the crematoria. The second time I went two months later to start up the ventilation in a newly built crematorium. When I was in the concentration camp mentioned above, I personally observed how the SS men herded up to 300 people – men, women and children – not far from me, who apparently had no idea where they were being led. I also saw that all these people were being chased into a wooden barracks that had no windows. This barracks was connected by a closed corridor to the gas chamber in which I had installed the ventilation system. The group of people mentioned was chased into the wooden barracks at about 4 pm. I didn't know what was done with them, but the following day, at about 10 am, when I was in the crematorium, I saw sixty corpses of men, women and children of various ages lying naked on the floor. They were all dead, and had been taken to the crematorium to be incinerated. It gave the appearance as if all sixty people lying in the crematorium had been murdered in the gas chamber.

³³⁵ Воздуходувки, vozdukhoduvki.

³³⁶ As documented earlier, Schultze went to Auschwitz at least three times.

Question: What were you doing in the crematorium at the time when the sixty bodies were brought in for cremation?

Answer: When the sixty corpses were brought into the crematorium for incineration, I was giving instructions to the fitters of the ventilation equipment on how to put it into operation, because it was a crematorium that had just been completed.

Question: So you were directly involved in testing the function of the crematorium and the ventilation equipment you installed in the crematorium?

Answer: Yes, the newly built crematorium and the ventilation equipment I installed for the crematorium were tested with my direct involvement. At that time, all sixty corpses lying there were cremated.

Question: That means you were directly involved in the extermination of innocent people?

Answer: Yes, that's right. Because I started up the ventilation system in the crematorium just as people were being incinerated there, I was directly involved in the extermination of people.³³⁷

Question: How long were you in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: The first time I was in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp for one day, the second time for six days.

Question: Why were you in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp for six days the second time?

³³⁷ In fact, during his second and final visit to Birkenau, on 24 and 25 March 1943, Schultze did not “started up the ventilation system in the crematorium” at all, because the crematorium's forced-draft systems were damaged and did not work, so that they had to be disassembled.

Answer: Because there were no people to be exterminated when I arrived at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I was unable to test the functioning of the ventilation system and the [furnaces of the] crematoria, and I had to spend six days there until a transport of people of different nationalities and ages was brought in. As I said before, I carried out the practical test of the crematorium's functioning after sixty people had been murdered in the gas chamber and then burned in the crematorium with my participation. Then, after I had established that the ventilation system in the crematorium was working properly, I left the concentration camp.³³⁸

Question: You previously testified that you only learned that innocent people were being exterminated in the crematoria built by Prüfer together with you, when you saw sixty corpses in the crematorium, and now you state that you waited six days in the concentration camp for a transport for the extermination certain people.³³⁹ So you knew beforehand that innocent people were being exterminated in the crematoria?

Answer: Yes, I am forced to admit that, even before I saw the sixty corpses I mentioned earlier, I knew that innocent people were being exterminated in the crematoria I built together with Prüfer. That is why I sat in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp and waited until a transport of people destined for extermination arrived so that I could test the functioning of the crematorium and the ventilation system during the incineration³⁴⁰ of the corpses of the innocent people previously murdered in the gas chambers.³⁴¹

The interrogation ends at 3:40 p.m.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed accurately, was read to me through the interpreter in my native language, and I sign it (signed: Schultze).

Questioned: investigating judge of the "Smersh" service of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi (signed: Morskoi).

Interpreter: Datsyuk (signed: Datsyuk).

³³⁸ Schultze visited Birkenau three times, in the second half of February, on 1 March and on 24-25 March 1943, but if we follow the orthodox narrative, homicidal gassings had not yet begun at the time of the first two visits. During the third visit, however, "the crematorium ventilation system," meaning the forced-draft systems were not working at all, as mentioned earlier. This is one of the many contradictions showing that the Topf engineers made Soviet propaganda their own as a defensive strategy.

³³⁹ This is another contradiction that relates to the explanation in the previous note.

³⁴⁰ По времясжигания. po vremjaszhiganiya: this confirms that Schultze was referring to the forced-draft systems of Crematorium II.

³⁴¹ Schultze's repeated reference to "gas chambers," plural, in connection with an alleged event that presumably took place in the alleged "gas chamber," singular, of Crematorium II, is further evidence that the Topf engineer was not recounting real experiences, but the propaganda stories he had learned from Soviet investigators.

4) Interrogation Protocol dated 20 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk

The interrogation began at 11:40 a.m.

The interrogation was conducted through interpreter Datsyuk, who was warned against unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Datsyuk).

Question: You are accused of being involved in the design and construction of the cremation furnaces as an engineer and designer of ventilation equipment in the factory of the Topf Company together with the Chief Engineer Prüfer – i.e. you designed ventilation equipment and blowers for them – of which up to 20 were manufactured on the orders of the SS management for the cremation of the corpses of people tortured to death in the concentration camps. In 1943, you designed and built two ventilation systems for the gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, in which innocent people were brutally suffocated. In the spring of 1943, you traveled to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp especially to test the ventilation equipment you had built in the crematorium furnace, and with your participation, the bodies of the people tortured to death were burned there. The crimes committed by you are covered by the first part of the decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR of 19 April 1943. Do you understand the charges against you, and to what specifically do you plead guilty?

Answer: The charges brought against me on the basis of the first part of the decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR of 19 April 1943 have been explained to me, and they are comprehensible to me. I plead fully guilty to having designed and built cremation furnaces as an engineer and designer of ventilation equipment in the factory of the Topf Company in Erfurt together with the chief engineer of the department crematorium construction, Prüfer, meaning that I designed and built ventilation equipment and blowers for these furnaces for the Buchenwald, Auschwitz, Dachau and other concentration camps on behalf of the SS leadership. I can no longer remember how many cremation furnaces were [designed and built] with my direct involvement. The bodies of people of various nationalities who had been tortured to death in the concentration camps were cremated in the cremation furnaces.

In addition, in 1943, I personally constructed two ventilation systems for two gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, in which completely innocent people were brutally suffocated by the Germans, who had been deported there from various countries in Western Europe.

In the spring of 1943, I don't remember the exact month, I went to Auschwitz especially to test the ventilation system I had built for the cremation furnaces. I waited six days until a transport of people destined for extermination arrived at the concentration camp. At that time, I was involved in burning the bodies of people who had been tortured to death in the gas chambers.³⁴¹

The questioning ends at 1:20 p.m. The transcript with my statements was transcribed accurately, was read to me through the interpreter in my native language, and I sign it (signed: Schultze).

Interrogated by: investigating judge of the "Smersh" service of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi (signed: Morskoi).

Interpreter: Datsyuk (signed: Datsyuk).

5) Interrogation Protocol dated 28 March 1946

Interrogator: Lieutenant Tereshchenko [Терещенко]

Interpreter: Lieutenant Goldfarb [Голдфарб]

I, the investigating judge of the 2nd section of the 4th Ukrainian office of the "Smersh" of the Soviet army group in Germany, Lieutenant Tereshchenko, today questioned through the German language interpreter Lieutenant Goldfarb the detainee

Schultze, Karl, son of Karl, born in 1900, originally from Berlin, residing in Erfurt, Rudoldstätter Strasse 3e, son of the owner of a sugar mill, clerk, of unfinished higher education, by profession mechanical engineer, in recent times worked in the company Topf and Sons in Erfurt.

The interrogation begins at 10:00 and ends at 3:05.

The interpreter, Lieutenant Goldfarb, was warned against unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Goldfarb).

Question: State your last name and first name!

Answer: My family name is Schultze, my first name is Karl. I don't have any other names or surnames.

Question: Which political organizations and parties were you a member of?

Answer: Apart from the fact that I was a member of the "Labor Front" organization – the fascist trade union – from 1933 to 1945, I did not belong to any other parties or organizations.

Question: Did you hold leading positions in the fascist “Labor Front” organization?

Answer: I was only an ordinary member of the “Labor Front” organization the whole time.

Question: Tell us about your professional activities!

Answer: I finished elementary school in the town of Babelsberg in 1914; then I trained as a locksmith and draftsman in the same town. From June to November 1918, I completed military training as a soldier in an artillery unit of the German army. From 1919 to 1922, I studied at a private technical college for mechanical engineering in Berlin; after graduating, I joined Siemens und Schuckert’s steam-powered equipment department in the same year. I worked there as a design engineer until 1923. From 1924 to 1926, I continued to work as a designer in the Berlin company Daniberg and Quandt, in the fans and blowers department. From 1926 to 1928, I worked successively for the companies Pulenski and Zeptner – where I designed boiler equipment for the production of sugar from cellulose – Bamol (as a designer of metal structures) and Junkers Tassar (as an engineer for fans and blowers).³⁴² From 1928 until recently, I worked for Topf and Sons as an engineer and designer of fans, extractors, boilers, blowers and heating equipment. During these years, I lived in Erfurt, where the Topf Company is based.

Question: Tell us what products the Topf Company manufactured!³⁴³

Answer: The Topf Company was a manufacturer of heating and ventilation devices and other equipment. It was divided into different departments depending on the type of products manufactured. Department D, for example, manufactured the following: complete boiler equipment,³⁴⁴ heating equipment for industrial operations,³⁴⁵ furnaces for crematoria,³⁴⁶ equipment for evaluating exhaust and industrial gases for heating.³⁴⁷ The so-called Department E produced the following: dryers for malt for beer brewing,³⁴⁸ silo equipment for storing vegetables,³⁴⁹ air-conveying systems³⁵⁰ for vegetables, dryers for silo towers, cleaning machines for grain, equipment for disinfesting grain, etc.³⁵¹ Department F produced lifts and conveyor systems. Department B produced ventilation equipment for crematoria,³⁵² vacuum dryers for wool, wood (sawdust), hides, etc., as well as air-heating systems for apartments,³⁵³ and equipment for humidifying³⁵⁴ air in baths and laundries.

The Topf Company was founded in the sixties of the last century.³⁵⁵ It was last managed by the brothers Ernst and Ludwig Topf. Until 1941, the company employed 600 to 700 workers; during the war years, there were considerably more. At present, the Topf Company fulfills various orders for the USSR, for example silo equipment, etc.

When listing the above products manufactured by Topf, I must add that during the German-Soviet War, from 1942 onwards, Department D of Topf carried out special orders from the SS Reich leadership for the manufacture of special furnaces for the crematoria that were set up in the concentration camps Buchenwald, Dachau and Auschwitz.

Question: How do you know that the Topf Company manufactured furnaces for the crematoria at the German death camps Buchenwald, Dachau and Auschwitz?

Answer: I know about this from the chief engineer of the Topf Company, Prüfer, who was responsible for the orders, and managed the production of furnaces. I also know about it, because I myself came into direct contact with these orders, as I was responsible for the design of ventilation equipment in the crematoria. As a rule, the company was allocated a special ration of metal to fulfill these orders. The work was supervised by SS Sturmbannführer Bischoff. After completion of the requested product, he [the inspector] drove straight from the company to the destination. The company provided qualified bricklayers³⁵⁶ who visited the concentration camps to install the furnaces.

Question: How many furnaces were made for the crematoria of the camps you mentioned?

Answer: From the drawings I was involved with, I reliably know of ten furnaces for the crematoria that were made by our company for the concentration camps. As far as I can remember at the moment, they were all sent to Auschwitz. However, I must explain that I do not know the exact number of furnaces made for the cremation of corpses that were sent to the concentration camps, because I did not learn of all the orders. I remember that the Topf Company manufactured furnaces for crematoria for Buchenwald and Dachau even before the beginning of the German-Soviet war in 1941.

Question: Who designed the furnaces for the crematoria?

Answer: This work, both in terms of design and construction, was carried out directly by the chief engineer of the Topf Company Prüfer Kurt. As an engineer for ventilation equipment, I was called in by Prüfer to design and equip the ventilation equipment for the cremation furnaces, which, as I have already said, were installed in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in 1942-1943.

Question: Describe the technical equipment of the cremation furnaces which were sent to the camps in Auschwitz and elsewhere, and name the differences to the furnaces of ordinary crematoria which were built by the Topf Company in various towns before 1941!

Answer: In ordinary crematoria, there was only one large opening (muffle) into which the coffin with the corpse could be easily inserted. In crematoria for the camps, however, the furnaces were larger, and each had three muffles of a smaller size than the furnaces of an ordinary crematorium. Five furnaces were installed in one of the camp crematoria. The bodies were not pushed into the furnaces on movable carts mounted on rollers, but simply inserted into the muffle with the help of a hand-carried stretcher.

The interrogation was completed.

My statements were transcribed accurately in my own words, the transcript was read to me in German (signed: Schultze).

6) Interrogation Protocol dated 18 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 14:30 and ended at 17:25.³⁵⁷

³⁵⁷ The manuscript has the date 18 February 1948, while the typescript shows 18 March 1948.

Question: Did you report to engineer Kurt Prüfer during your work at Topf and Sons?

Answer: When I worked at the Topf Company, I and Prüfer Kurt were on the same level, and neither of us was subordinate to the other. We both worked in the design office as chief engineers, and were group leaders. I was in charge of Group B – design and construction of ventilation equipment³⁵⁸ – and Prüfer K. was in charge of Group D-IV – design and construction of cremation furnaces and heating equipment.³⁵⁹ In a number of cases, I had to coordinate the work of my group with that of Prüfer Kurt's group, because the design of ventilation equipment and blowers was linked to the design of cremation furnaces and heating equipment. The head of the design office was Engineer Sander Fritz.

Question: What was your relationship with Prüfer Kurt; were there no close personal relationships between you?

Answer: For the entire duration of my work in the company's design office, I maintained a purely professional relationship with Prüfer. There were never any closer personal relationships between us.

Question: When and in which German concentration camps did the Topf and Sons Company carry out work on the construction and equipment of crematoria and gas chambers?

Answer: As far as I know, the Topf and Sons Company carried out work on the construction of crematoria from 1940 to 1944. During this period, the company built and equipped crematoria in the concentration camps Buchenwald, Mauthausen, Auschwitz and others whose names I do not remember. Gas chambers were only set up in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. All the work mentioned was carried out by the Topf Company on the orders of the SS authorities.

Question: What part did Prüfer and you personally play in carrying out this work?

Answer: Prüfer, as a specialist in cremation equipment, supervised and directed the work on the construction of the camp crematoria, and also constructed incineration furnaces for these crematoria. I personally designed blowers and ventilation equipment for the camp crematoria, and in some cases directly supervised the assembly work. In particular, I personally supervised the assembly of the blowers and ventilation equipment for the crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. I traveled to this camp three times in 1943 for this purpose.

³⁵⁸ Proper term "heating – ventilation – blower construction" (Heizung – Lüftung-Gebläsebau).

³⁵⁹ Proper term "furnace construction" (Ofenbau).

Question: Which other camps did you go to?

Answer: Apart from Auschwitz, I also went to Buchenwald Concentration Camp, where I was in charge of installing the ventilation equipment for the heating system of the barracks in which the camp guards were housed. I designed the ventilation equipment for the crematorium in the camp, and manufactured it in the factory of the Topf Company based on my drawings. However, its assembly on site, i.e. in the camp crematorium, was not carried out by me, but by one of the company fitters. I did not visit any other concentration camps.

Question: Were there gas chambers in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp?

Answer: I don't know. I only knew that there were gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: You have been presented with order forms no. 43/588, no. 43/836/2 and no. 44/257/3, which show that the Topf and Sons Company manufactured powerful ventilation devices for sucking in and expelling air on the orders of the SS authorities, and delivered them to the Buchenwald Concentration Camp. Explain what these devices were used for and why they were made!

Answer: In response to orders no. 43/836/2 of 9 June 43 and no. 44/257/3 of 18 February 44 issued by the SS construction office of the Buchenwald Camp, the Topf and Sons Company manufactured powerful ventilation equipment for the roofed shooting range of the Gustloffwerke [transcription] military factory in the town of Weimar. This factory was located in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp zone, and prisoners were deployed there. Guns manufactured by this company were used in the firing range (I don't know what kind of guns). For this reason, the air in the shooting range was always contaminated with fumes. Ventilation equipment was therefore installed in the room of this firing range to clean the air. In response to order no. 43/588/1 dated 5 May 1943, the Topf Company manufactured a ventilation system for the central boiler room of the heating system, more precisely for the boiler systems of the central heating system of the Buchenwald Camp's barracks. The assembly work for the installation of the ventilators was carried out both in the Gustloffwerke shooting range and in the central boiler room of the Buchenwald Camp under my supervision. I do not know what the SS construction office of Buchenwald Concentration Camp had to do with the installation of the ventilation equipment in the aforementioned firing range.

Question: What part did you play in the construction and equipping of the crematorium in the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp?

Answer: My part in the construction and equipping of the crematorium in the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp was that I designed special blowers for the incineration furnaces of this crematorium, thanks to which the capacity of these furnaces was increased. This was also my contribution to the construction of the crematoria in the concentration camps Dachau, Mauthausen and Buchenwald.

Question: You have been shown a drawing of the crematorium built by Topf and Sons Company in the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp. What part did you personally play in the production of this drawing?

Answer: As can be seen from the title of the drawing presented to me, the Topf and Sons Company did indeed design a crematorium for the Gross-Rosen Concentration Camp. However, I personally had no part in designing the project or creating the drawing of this crematorium. I assume that the chief engineer of the company's design office, Prüfer, was responsible for the technical elaboration of the project for the crematorium's furnace room.

Question: At which concentration camps did you participate in the design of the crematorium projects?

Answer: During the construction of the crematoria in the concentration camps, the Topf and Sons Company designed projects for the furnace rooms and produced drawings of them. This work was carried out by Chief Engineer Prüfer. On the drawings of these crematoria already available, I personally only drew in the blowers and ventilation equipment in the rooms shown on the drawings, where they – i.e. the blowers and ventilation equipment – had to be installed.

Question: You have been presented with two drawings of Crematoria Nos. 2/3 and Nos. 4/5, which were built and equipped by the Topf Company in the Birkenau sector of the Auschwitz death camp. What part did you personally play in the creation of the projects and drawings for these crematoria?

Answer: The documents presented to me as No. 1 and No. 2 are drawings of Crematoria Nos. 2/3 and Nos. 4/5, which were built and equipped by the Topf and Sons Company of the Birkenau sector of the Auschwitz death camp. Document 1 is the rough draft of the room of Crematoria 2/3 (they were completely identical); I had not seen this drawing until that time [presumably: until the time when I had to enter the ventilation equipment on it]. At the time, this drawing of these crematoria was sent to the Topf Company by the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Camp, and I personally used it to work out and draw up the diagram of the ventilation ducts for the rooms of this crematorium, and also marked on this drawing the place where the ventilation equipment was to be installed. I personally used Drawing 4/5 (document no. 2) to carry out the same work as for Crematorium 2/3.

The record of the interrogation was read to me in German translation, my statements were transcribed accurately (signed: Schultze).

The interrogation started at 21:15 and ended at 24:00.

Question: Since when have you known Eng. Gustav Braun, and what relations have you had with him?

Answer: I have known Eng. Gustav Braun because of our work together at the Topf and Sons Company roughly since 1936 or 1937. I had occasion only rarely to meet with him, and in such cases, this was about business matters. Our relations were only business in nature. I had and have no personal relations with him.

Question: What position did Braun hold in the Topf and Sons Company?

Answer: For the entire period that I knew him, Gustav Braun worked as production manager of the Topf and Sons Company.

Question: Were you an employee of Braun in your work at the Topf and Sons Company?

Answer: No, I was not an employee of his. I was working in the company's design department, which was not headed by Gustav Braun; my direct superior was the owner of the company, Ludwig Topf.

Question: Within the activities of the Topf and Sons Company, what was within Gustav Braun's sphere of responsibility as head of production of this company?

Answer: I cannot answer this question precisely, because it is beyond my knowledge. I only know that Braun's duties included the entire production activity of the company. Together with the general planning office, he drew up the company's general production plans, and was the direct head of the company's factory in Erfurt, in which all possible equipment was made, including cremation devices, among other things. However, military orders were also carried out.

Question: It is well known that the Topf and Sons Company also carried out work outside the company's area – directly at customers' premises, for heating and boiler devices, in the assembly of fans, blowers, etc. Say, what relationship did Braun have with these jobs?

Answer: As the company's head of production, Braun had a direct relationship with such work, because it was carried out by the workshops, installers and other specialists in the company who were subordinate to him.

Question: So Braun also had a direct relationship with those works that were carried out by the Topf Company in the concentration camps in the construction and equipping of crematoria and gas chambers?

Answer: Precisely. As production manager of the Topf Company, Braun selected and sent to the concentration camps Buchenwald, Auschwitz, etc., specialists who built crematoria and ventilation systems in these camps, and installed other equipment in the crematoria and gas chambers. At the same time, under the personal direction of G. Braun, various equipment for the crematoria and gas chambers that were located in the camps were built in the company's factory. In particular, ventilation equipment for the gas chambers in the Auschwitz Camp was built in the company's factory.

Question: Which of the Topf Company's installers was actually sent by Braun to the concentration camps to perform the above work?

Answer: I only know that, of the company's installers employed by Braun, Koch and Holick worked in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp on the construction of the crematoria, and that Messing installed the ventilation systems in the gas chambers. I personally saw these installers at the Auschwitz Camp when I went there in the spring and summer of 1943.³⁶⁰ Question: Did Braun personally go to the concentration camps?

Answer: To the best of my knowledge, Braun did not go to the concentration camps.

The record of the interrogation was read to me in German translation, my statements were transcribed accurately (signed: Schultze).

³⁶⁰ No visit in the summer of 1943 is documented.

Interrogated by: the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed: Doperchuk).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush.

8) Interrogation Protocol dated 11 March 1948

Interrogators: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk, Lieutenant Colonel Novikov

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation began at 11:10 and ended at 22:30.

Question: For how long and in what capacity did you work in the German machine-building company Topf and Sons?

Answer: I worked continuously at the Topf and Sons Company from October 1928 until the day of my arrest, that is, until 5 March 1946, holding the position of chief engineer in the machine-building department, which was called “D.” In that department, I personally headed the ventilation-equipment section, which was called section “V.”

Question: Did you ever go abroad?

Answer: I lived all the time in Germany. Only in 1942 and maybe even in 1943 – I don’t remember exactly – I had to go briefly from Germany to the occupied part of Poland.

Question: Under what circumstances did you go from Germany to occupied Polish territory?

Answer: After Germany had occupied Poland, the Topf and Sons Company was commissioned by the Reich Railway Office to partially re-equip and rebuild the boiler and ventilation systems in the railway workshops in Warsaw, Krakow and other cities. In this connection, I went on the company’s behalf to these workshops to get an idea on the spot about the progress of the work, and to make the necessary drawings and technical calculations.

Question: Under what circumstances did you return to Poland?

Answer: In addition to the above-mentioned case, I went the same year to Warsaw to install ventilation systems in a sawmill in a Warsaw suburb.

Question: Why are you silent that you went several times to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, which was located in the occupied territory of Poland?

Answer: I thought that the territory where the Auschwitz Concentration Camp is located belonged to Germany and not to Poland, because all of Upper Silesia had been annexed to the German Reich. We Germans, including myself, considered only the regions belonging to the so-called “General Government” to be Polish territory.

Question: But still, you had to go to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: Yes, I had to go there.

Question: How many times?

Answer: Three times.

Question: When exactly and under what circumstances?

Answer: All three times, I went to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in the first half of 1943, during the construction and assembly of ventilation systems in the crematoria and gas chambers. I performed this work on behalf of the Topf Company. It had received a special order for this from the SS construction office of the camp.

Question: Were you personally summoned by SS authorities in these matters?

Answer: Yes, I was summoned. After my arrival at the Auschwitz Camp, I was first summoned by an SS man, a member of the staff of this camp, who warned me by telling me that the construction and equipment work of crematoria and gas chambers carried out by the company constituted an important state secret,³⁶¹ and made me sign a declaration obliging me to keep silent. Already earlier, the owner of the company Ludwig Topf had made me sign a similar statement, because I was coming into direct contact with work that the company was performing on behalf of the SS construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: Explain exactly what work was performed by you personally or with your direct participation in the construction and equipping of crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz death camp.

Answer: In the years 1941-1943 in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, or more precisely in the Birkenau sector of the camp, four crematoria were built, in which the Topf and Sons Company assembled 18 cremation furnaces³⁶² for cremating corpses, and set up four [sic] gas chambers. My personal participation in the execution of the above work consisted of this:

1) In accordance with the assignments that the Topf Company had received from the SS authorities, I executed the technical drawings of the blowers and ventilation systems for the cremation furnaces of Crematoria

³⁶¹ This claim is at odds with the one that Schultze learned about the “gas chambers” during his last visit to Auschwitz on 24 and 25 March 1943.

³⁶² The ten triple-muffle furnaces of Crematoria II and III and the two 8-muffle furnaces of Crematoria IV and V, considered by Schultze to be 8 double-muffle furnaces.

II and III, as well as for the gas chambers of Crematoria II, III, and IV³⁶³ of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, and supervised their construction.

2) Work on the installation of ventilation systems in Crematoria II and III and in the gas chambers that were located inside the crematoria was carried out under my direction and with my personal participation. I did not personally carry out any other work in the Auschwitz Camp.

Question: When exactly did you work in Auschwitz on the assembly of the ventilation systems in the aforementioned crematoria and gas chambers?

Answer: I performed this work in February-March 1943.

Question: What were the gas chambers at Auschwitz officially called in the documents?

Answer: In drawings and other documents, these gas chambers of the Auschwitz crematoria were called “corpse rooms or chambers.”

Question: We now show you a photocopy of a letter dated 9 December 1940, that the Topf and Sons Company sent to the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. It mentions there the installation of ventilation systems in the rooms for corpses and for the autopsy of corpses then already existing in this camp. It can be inferred from the document shown to you that the Topf Company was already in charge of setting up gas chambers in Auschwitz in 1940. Answer truthfully to these findings.

Answer: The letter from the Topf and Sons Company dated 9 December 1940, of which I have now been shown a photocopy, was personally drafted by me, and sent to the construction office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. As it appears from this letter, the Topf and Sons Company, as a result of talks between Chief Engineer Kurt Prüfer and SS Untersturmführer [Walter] Urbanczyk, was commissioned to carry out a design and cost estimate for work on the fitting out of the corpse rooms and corpse-autopsy rooms then existing in Auschwitz Concentration Camp, Crematorium I, Auschwitz Camp Sector, with ventilation facilities. By order of the owner of the Ludwig Topf Company, I made a plan and cost estimate for this work, but for some reason the construction office did not accept it. I do not know for what actual purposes the SS construction office intended to equip the above-mentioned rooms with ventilation facilities. Likewise, I did not know that there were plans to use these rooms as gas chambers.³⁶⁴ Likewise, I did not know that there were plans to use these premises as gas chambers.

³⁶³ On 18 May 1943, the Central Construction Office ordered from Topf “2 deaeration devices for Crematoria IV and V.” On 9 June, Topf confirmed receipt of the order (RGVA, 502-2-26, p. 221) and enclosed the corresponding cost estimate, which included a blower No. 450 with attachments, priced at RM 2,510 (RGVA, 502-2-26, pp. 222-225). Topf issued the corresponding invoice No. 2134 /132/ 43 D 775 on 23 December 1943 (RGVA, 502-2-26, p. 220), the final payment for which was made on 13 July 1944 (RGVA, 502-2-26, pp. 217-218a). The system was not installed in either crematorium. Given its nature (deaeration device), it was undoubtedly intended for the furnace room. The above-mentioned cost estimate was drafted by Schultze, as is evident from the caption “Unsere Abteilung: B/Schu.”

Question: Crematorium I in the Auschwitz sector of the camp was set up by the Topf Company in the years 1940-1941. What part did you personally have in the work of setting up these crematoria?

Answer: To the best of my knowledge, only one cremation furnace was installed in Crematorium I at Auschwitz by the Topf and Sons Company. This happened at the end of 1940, but then, in 1941, the Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp decided to expand and enlarge the capacity of this crematorium. In this context, the company installed two more cremation furnaces in the said crematorium. In addition, by order of the owner of the firm, Ludwig Topf, I personally designed a special blower for the furnaces of this crematorium, thanks to which the capacity of these furnaces was increased.³⁶⁵ I also designed the ventilation system for the furnace room of the crematorium. I know that the blower was built in the factory of the Topf Company according to my drawings, and was mounted in the said crematorium. At the moment, I do not remember whether the ventilation system was also mounted there. I only know that it, too, was built in the factory of the company.

Question: Did you ever go to Crematorium I in Auschwitz?

³⁶⁴ Here, too, Schultze pandered to Soviet propaganda, which wanted Auschwitz to have been established from the start as an “extermination camp” in which “gas chambers” were planned from the beginning. The document in question, the Letter by Topf to SS New Construction Office Auschwitz dated 9 December 1940, concerned the “deaeration device for the corpses cells and for the autopsy room” for the Auschwitz Main Camp’s crematorium, to which the relevant “cost estimate” was attached. This was the ventilation project for an ordinary crematorium, as Schultze was well aware. Even for the Polish orthodox narrative, the letter is much too early to have any homicidal implications. According to that narrative, Himmler allegedly gave Höss the order for Jewish extermination at Auschwitz only in June 1941. Therefore, linking the document in question to homicidal gas chambers is nonsensical from any perspective.

³⁶⁵ This has to be forced-draft system (Saugzuganlage), which, by drawing more combustion air through the hearth grates into the gas generators of the furnaces, allowed a higher grate regime (coke consumption), and thus a certain increase in the cremation capacity of the furnace. In the case of Auschwitz Crematorium I, however, one forced-draft device served all three furnaces contemporarily, which minimized the benefit when all furnaces were used together.

Answer: No, I never entered this crematorium, and did not perform any installation work there. I currently do not remember who installed the blower in the said crematorium.

Question: What part did you have in setting up the gas chamber in this crematorium?

Answer: I had no part whatsoever in setting up the gas chamber in Crematorium I of the Auschwitz camp sector.

Question: Who carried out the work of setting up the central boiler room with ventilation facilities in the Auschwitz Camp?

Answer: I do not know. I personally did not perform any such work, and, to the best of my knowledge, our company did not perform such work at all in Auschwitz.³⁶⁶ Question: How were the ventilation systems you installed in the gas chambers and the blower in the crematoria of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp used?

Answer: As I have already explained, in the Birkenau sector of the camp, under my personal direction, the blowers were installed in the cremation furnaces of Crematoria II and III, also the ventilation systems in the gas chambers, which had been set up in the basement rooms of these crematoria. Crematorium II was prepared in March 1943 and I, during my second trip to the Auschwitz Camp, personally checked the blowers and ventilation systems installed in that crematorium, and handed them over to the SS Construction Office of this camp for use. This took place as follows:

After I had arrived in Auschwitz in March 1943 – I no longer remember the exact date; however, I know it was a Monday – I learned that the installation work on the ventilation equipment in the gas chamber of the second crematorium would be completed in one or two days; it was not until Wednesday that I was able to check it, and was convinced that it was working flawlessly. Likewise, I carried out the testing of the blower. However, the head of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp who was there, von Bischoff, stated that the blower had to be checked when cremating corpses in the furnaces, that is, at the time when the maximum temperature was reached in these furnaces. At that time the furnaces in the second crematorium were still being dried before their use, and no corpses had yet been cremated there. Under such circumstances, von Bischoff suggested that I wait until a prisoner transport arrived at the camp; then, he said, we could carry out the check and put the blower into operation [воздуходувку, vozduchoduvku].³⁶⁷

The transport in question arrived at the camp on Saturday, and on the same day I checked with von Bischoff the operation, more precisely the operation during the activity, of both the blower and the ventilation systems in the gas chamber. On that occasion, about 150-300 inmates from the newly arrived transport were pushed by the SS into the gas chamber and poisoned with gas, then their corpses were cremated in the cremation furnaces. In this group of inmates who were killed in the gas chamber were men, women and children. At the time when the SS pushed them into the gas chamber, I was in the crematorium building, next to the cremation furnaces. The corpses of these inmates were cremated in my presence. After the killing of this group of inmates in the gas chamber had been carried out (which lasted no more than 50 minutes), an SS man in my presence turned on the ventilation systems, thanks to which the poisoned air was expelled from the gas chamber, and fresh air was introduced into it. Since it turned out in this test that the blower and ventilation systems worked well, they were put into operation the same day by the SS Construction Office, that is, that Saturday I returned from Auschwitz to Erfurt. The blower and ventilation systems that had been installed at the furnaces and in the gas chamber of Crematorium III were tested by the SS Central Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp and put into operation in my absence.

Question: We show you a photocopy of a letter from the company “Topf und Söhne” to the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp dated 24 February 1943, in which you are informed that you would be arriving at the camp on 1 March 1943, to put into operation the aeration and de-aeration system of Crematorium II. Tell us what facilities were involved in this letter.

Answer: The above letter referred to putting into operation the ventilation devices that had been installed under my direction in the gas chamber of this crematorium, as I mentioned earlier. To what I have already stated, I want to add that at that time, in addition to carrying out the blower testing at the cremation furnaces, I also checked the ventilation systems that had been installed under my direction in the furnace room and in the corpse autopsy room.

Question: So, as it appears from the above-mentioned letter, you were sent by the company to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp specifically to put into operation the ventilation systems installed in the gas chamber of the second crematorium. Did you understand that correctly?

³⁶⁷ Crematorium II was equipped with three forced-draft devices, one for each chimney duct. Therefore, the use of the singular here makes no sense.

Answer: Absolutely correct. The company sent me to the Auschwitz Camp at the request of the SS Construction Office to carry out such work.

Question: After your return from Auschwitz, to whom did you report on the results of the testing and commissioning of the ventilation systems in the gas chamber that you performed?

Answer: Upon my return from Auschwitz to Erfurt, I reported to the owner of the Ludwig Topf Company about the testing work on the blower and ventilation system in Auschwitz Crematorium II that I had performed. On that occasion, I informed him that the SS had poisoned a group of inmates in the gas chamber, and that their corpses were then cremated in the crematorium furnaces. L. Topf then replied nothing.

Question: During the interrogation of 4 March 1946, you stated that, on your trip to Auschwitz in the spring of 1943 in the company of K. Prüfer, you had told him about this event as well. Why do you keep silent about it now?

Answer: I do not deny it. I probably did indeed report to Prüfer about this poisoning of inmates in the gas chamber, but since a lot of time has passed since then, I could not remember the circumstances and content of the conversation.

Question: Did you have to do your trip to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp together with Engineer Prüfer?

Answer: I was at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp together with Kurt Prüfer only once, in the spring of 1943.

Question: On what occasion?

Answer: We visited the aforementioned camp at the request of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz Camp to find out why the blower at the cremation furnaces of the second crematorium was not working. We found that the deformation of the blower blades of the blower fan and consequently also the failure of the blower had occurred because a very high, certainly continuous temperature had been maintained in the furnaces of the crematorium all the time. After we arrived at the site, we agreed with the head of the Construction Office, von Bischoff, that we would disassemble this blower, because we did not consider it advisable to repair it. When Prüfer and I were at the crematorium, there on the floor next to the crematoria lay about 60 bodies of inmates, who, I suspect, had been killed in the gas chamber. Then, the corpses of about 25 of these inmates were cremated in our presence. After this fact, I no longer went to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Question: We show you the report of the commission of experts dated 14 February – 8 March 1945, from which it appears that in the Auschwitz death camp, in addition to the gas chambers in the crematoria, there were separately constructed gas chambers. Tell us what part the Topf Company had, and what part you personally had, in the construction and setting up of these gas chambers.

Answer: As I have already stated in the course of the investigation, under my direction and with my personal participation, the gas chambers of the second and third crematoria were equipped with ventilation systems. In addition, ventilation systems were designed and cost estimates were drawn up for setting up gas chambers of the fourth crematorium. As for the other gas chambers that existed at Auschwitz besides those in the crematoria, I was not involved in their construction and set-up, and to the best of my knowledge, the Topf and Sons Company did not perform this work.

Question: How many inmates were killed daily at Auschwitz in the crematoria and gas chambers built and equipped there with your participation?

Answer: I cannot answer this question, because I have no information about it.

Question: We show you a photocopy of a report of the SS Construction Office of the Auschwitz death camp dated 28 June 1943, from which it appears that in said camp in the crematoria and gas chambers built and set up with your personal participation, 4,756 inmates were exterminated per day. What can you say about the contents of this document?

Answer: I have no reason to dispute these official figures. The document shown to me testifies in favor of the fact that in the Auschwitz crematoria and gas chambers built and equipped with my direct participation, more than 4,700 inmates were exterminated per day.

Question: This therefore means that you, by collaborating at Auschwitz in the construction and setting up of powerful crematoria and gas chambers, thereby created perfected technical instruments for the extermination of completely innocent people, and thus became an accomplice to crimes that the Hitlerites perpetrated there.

Answer: I am forced to admit that, by collaborating in Auschwitz in the setting up of the crematoria and gas chambers, I thereby effectively created perfected technical instruments for the extermination of inmates. However, when I performed this work, I thought that, in the crematoria and gas chambers built and set up with my participation, the SS would not kill innocent people, but criminals who had been sentenced to death in Poland and other occupied territories for their activities against German troops and the German government.

Question: Your suspicions are not incorrect, because the SS, in addition to the extermination of people of the non-Aryan race of various ages and of both sexes, especially Jews, which took place in the gas chambers of Auschwitz, also killed there people who had fought for the liberation of their homeland against the German occupiers. [But] why do you consider this category of people to be criminals?

Answer: I was and am subject to the existing government in Germany and its laws. If anyone rose up against this government and the measures it took, and fought it, including, among other things, in German-occupied territories, I was of the opinion that these people were criminals, that is, that they had been convicted according to German laws, because they had killed representatives of the German authorities or groups of the armed forces.

Question: These ideas of yours do not differ in any way from those of the Nazis, who were entrenched behind their “laws” when they bestially settled accounts with anti-fascists.

Answer: I was never a member of the Nazi Party, but since I lived in Germany, I considered it my duty to observe the laws of my country, and submit to them.

Question: During the interrogation of 20 March 1946, a charge was brought against you under Item 1 of the decree of the Supreme Presidium of the USSR Soviets. You pleaded guilty to having carried out orders of the SS authorities in the years 1940-1943, to having participated directly in Auschwitz in the construction and setting up of crematoria and gas chambers, in which an extermination of completely innocent people took place, which means that you were complicit in the crimes that the Hitlerites perpetrated in the concentration camps. Explain what led you to embark on the path of this criminal activity.

Answer: I did not participate on my own initiative in the work of building and setting up crematoria and gas chambers at Auschwitz, but by order of the owner of the Topf and Sons Company, in which I was employed. If I had refused to perform this work, I would have been dismissed as a saboteur, and could have suffered retaliation. Because I feared this, I never addressed to the owner of the Ludwig Topf Company a plea to spare me from performing these jobs.

The transcript of the interrogation was read to me in German translation; my statements are recorded there accurately (signed: Schultze).

Interrogated by: The operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed: Doperchuk).

The military prosecutor of the Supreme Court of the USSR Justice Lieutenant Colonel Novikov (signed: Novikov).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the Fourth Section of the Third Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush (signed: Kush).

III) INTERROGATIONS OF FRITZ SANDER

1) Interrogation Protocol dated 7 March 1946

Interrogators: Captain Shatunovsky, Major Moruzhenko

7 March 1946: We, the head of the 2nd Department of the Smersh Organization of the Eighth Guards Army, Captain Shatunovsky, as well as the deputy head of the 2nd Department of the Guards, Major Moruzhenko, interrogated the detainee

Sander Fritz, son of Karl Paul, born 1876 in Leipzig, member of a family of clerks, employee, with intermediate technical training, German, citizen of the German state, resident of the city of Erfurt, Bumontstrasse³⁶⁸ 21.

[The interrogatee] was made aware of the consequences of false statements. The interpreter was made aware of his duty to translate correctly.

Question: Were you a member of the National-Socialist Party?

Answer: I was never a member of the National-Socialist Party, and I am still not today.

Question: Since when and in what position have you worked for the Topf Company?

Answer: I have been working for the Topf Company in Erfurt since October 1910 as a leading engineer and authorized signatory of the company.

Question: Tell us about your invention of the crematorium for mass incineration!

Answer: As a leading engineer at the Topf Company, I was head of the crematorium construction department, headed by Prüfer. The latter told me in 1942, I don't remember the exact date, during a conversation about the capacity of the crematoria [plural] that had been built in Auschwitz Concentration Camp, that they could not cope with the number of corpses to be cremated. He then gave me an example that two or three corpses were inserted into the insertion openings, but that the crematorium [singular] could not cope with the workload [нагружкой, nagruzkoj] in the concentration camps [plural]. At that time, as a specialist in the field of heating, I decided on my own initiative to build a crematorium with a higher capacity for cremating corpses. In November 1942, I had finished my project for a crematorium for mass cremation of corpses, and submitted it to the Reich Patent Office in Berlin. The crematorium for mass cremation was to be designed according to the principle of the conveyor-belt system, and corpses were to be continuously pushed into the furnace for cremation by mechanical means. The corpses were to enter the furnace under their own weight, falling by themselves onto the grate on a refractory surface³⁶⁹ with an inclination of 40 degrees, and burning under the effect of the fire. The corpses themselves were to serve as an additional source of fuel. This patent could not be officially registered with the state patent office because it was secret due to the war, but my invention was put into practice, and I was given the [patent] number.³⁷⁰

Question: Who designed and approved the construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps Auschwitz and Buchenwald?

Answer: Prüfer was responsible for the design and construction of the crematoria, Schultze for the ventilation systems for the crematoria. I checked these projects, and after I had done so, the Topf Company approved them.

Question: What was your target capacity for the crematorium for the mass cremation of corpses?

Answer: My idea in designing the crematorium for mass cremation of corpses is that the corpses enter the furnace without interruption. The number of corpses that can be incinerated in one hour in the crematorium I designed is significantly higher than the number incinerated in a [conventional] cremation furnace.

Question: What did Prüfer and Schultze tell you after their business trip to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: In the summer of 1942, Prüfer and Schultze reported to me that in the concentration camps [plural] of Auschwitz many people were exterminated in gas chambers, and their corpses burned in crematoria [plu-

³⁶⁹ The proper term is “Gleitbahn,” sliding surface, a kind of refractory-clay slide on which the corpses slid.

³⁷⁰ This is “PA (= Patent Anmeldung: patent application) 760198 dated 5 November 1942.

ral], whereby the strain [нагрузка: nagruzka] on the crematoria was so great that three corpses were put into one furnace opening [concurrently].

Question: That means you knew that completely innocent people were being exterminated in the concentration camps [plural] in Auschwitz?

Answer: Yes, from the summer of 1942, I knew that completely innocent people were being exterminated in gas chambers in the concentration camps in Auschwitz, and that their bodies were then burned in crematoria [plural]. Prüfer told me about colossal transports of people who came from Poland, Greece³⁷¹ and other countries to the concentration camps in Auschwitz, and were exterminated here.

Question: How was it that, although you knew that the crematoria in the concentration camps were used to exterminate innocent people, you nevertheless took the initiative to plan a crematorium for an even larger mass incineration?

Answer: As a German engineer and employee of the Topf Company, I considered it my duty to use all my knowledge to contribute to the victory of Hitler Germany, just like any other aircraft-design engineer, even if it meant the extermination of people.

Question: Do you know Braun?

Answer: Yes. I know Braun. He has worked as production manager at the Topf Company since 1936.

Question: Was Braun in charge of the crematorium-construction department?

Answer: As production manager, Braun also headed the department responsible for building the crematoria and setting up the gas chambers for the concentration camps.

My statements were written down accurately; they were read to me in German translation, and I sign in German.

Interrogated by: The head of the 2nd section of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guard Army, Guard Captain Shatunovsky. The deputy head of the 2nd section of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guard Army, Guard Major Moruzhenko.

2) Interrogation Protocol dated 13 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk

³⁷¹ The first transport with Jewish deportees from Greece arrived at Auschwitz on 24 March 1943.

On 13 March 1946, I, the investigating judge of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guards Army, Captain Morskoi of the Guard, on this day questioned the detainee

Sander, Fritz, son of Karl Paul, born in 1876, native of Leipzig, member of a family of clerks, clerk, with intermediate technical training.

The interrogation began at 10:20.

The interrogation was conducted through the interpreter Datsyuk, who was warned against unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic. (Signed: Datsyuk).

Question: Your profession?

Answer: I am an engineer by profession.

Question: Where did you work in this profession?

Answer: I worked as an engineer at the Topf Company from 1910, and from 1920 until recently, I worked there as chief engineer.

Question: Which German political parties were you a member of?

Answer: I didn’t belong to any party, but I was a member of the National-Socialist organizations Labor Front and NSFAU.

Question: When did you become a member of these fascist organizations, and what leading positions did you hold there?

Answer: I joined the National-Socialist organizations Labor Front and NSFAU in 1936, but did not hold any leading positions in these organizations.

Question: Who was responsible for building crematoria at the Topf Company?

Answer: The crematorium construction department at the Topf Company was headed by the chief engineer of this department, Prüfer.

Question: When did the Topf Company start producing crematoria for concentration camps?

Answer: The Topf Company began to manufacture crematoria for concentration camps around 1937/1938.

Question: Who placed the orders for the construction of crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: The orders to build crematoria for the concentration camps came from the SS leadership.

Question: Who was the designer of crematoria at the Topf Company?

Answer: The designer of all types of crematoria at the Topf Company, both stationary and mobile, was Engineer Prüfer. Engineer Schultze helped him with project planning and construction.

Question: What was your part in the design and construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps?

Answer: As the first engineer of the Topf Company, I headed the crematorium construction department, reviewed the crematorium projects that had been built by engineer Prüfer and Schultze, personally approved these projects, and then submitted them to the owner of the company, Ludwig Topf, for approval.

Question: When you were involved in the design and construction of the crematoria for the concentration camps, were you aware that innocent people were being burned in these crematoria?

Answer: Yes, I was aware that innocent people were cremated in the concentration camps in the crematoria built by the engineers Prüfer and Schultze with my participation.

Question: When did you become aware of this?

Answer: In 1942, I no longer remember the month, I learned in a conversation with Engineer Prüfer after his return from a business trip from Auschwitz that innocent people were being burned to death in the crematoria designed and built in the concentration camps.

Question: For what purpose did Prüfer go to the Auschwitz Concentration Camp?

Answer: This had to do with the fact that, after the construction of the crematoria, the Topf Company sent their people to the concentration camps to assemble the crematoria, and engineer Prüfer, as the construction manager and designer of the crematoria, went to the concentration camp [singular] to inspect how the assembly work was going; he was also present during the practical testing of the crematoria. After his return from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, Prüfer told me that he had been present during the testing of the crematoria built there, and had come to the conclusion that they were not very efficient and could not cope with the number of corpses that had to be cremated there. At the time, Prüfer gave me the example that, in his presence, two corpses at a time had been introduced into the opening of the crematoria, but the latter [the furnaces] had not been able to cope with the workload [с нагрузкой: s nagruzkoj] because there were so many corpses to be cremated in the concentration camp.

Question: When Prüfer told you that the crematoria had not managed to cremate the corpses, were you interested and did you ask him where so many corpses came from?

Answer: Yes, I asked Prüfer why there were so many corpses in the concentration camp, and he replied that people were murdered there in gas chambers, and their bodies transferred to the crematorium [singular] for cremation.

Question: What other concentration camps did Prüfer visit?

Answer: I know that in addition to Auschwitz Concentration Camp, Prüfer also went to Buchenwald Concentration Camp. I do not know whether he visited any other camps.

Question: Did engineer Schultze go to concentration camps?

Answer: Yes, Engineer Schultze went to the concentration camps Auschwitz and Buchenwald for the same reasons as Prüfer. I do not know whether he visited any other camps.

The interrogation ended at 15:55.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed accurately, was read to me in translation into my native language, and I sign it.

Interrogated by: The investigating judge of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Morskoi Guard.

Interpreter: Datsyuk.

3) Interrogation Protocol dated 21 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk.

The Interrogation started at 20:50.

Question: Explain in more detail when you spoke to Engineer Prüfer about the fact that the cremation furnaces you had built were too small and could not cremate the bodies in the concentration camps!

Answer: I remember well that this conversation between me and engineer Prüfer took place in the spring of 1942 – I can’t remember the exact month – after engineer Prüfer had returned from a business trip from the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, where he had checked the furnaces in the newly built crematorium.

Question: What did you talk about with Engineer Prüfer after he told you what has been explained here?

Answer: After the engineer Prüfer had informed me that the cremation furnaces we had built in Auschwitz were too small to incinerate the corpses there, I told him that it was essential to design cremation furnaces based on the conveyor-belt system³⁷² for the mass incineration of corpses in the concentration camps.

³⁷² Meaning continuously operating.

Question: Have you designed a new cremation furnace system?

Answer: Yes, after the relevant discussion between me and Engineer Prüfer, I had the idea of designing cremation furnaces based on the conveyor-belt system, and I set about realizing this project for the mass cremation of corpses in concentration camps.

Question: What was the operating principle of the new type of crematorium you designed?

Answer: The working principle of the new type of mass crematorium I designed was that, unlike the old ones, the new crematorium system was to introduce the corpses into the furnace for incineration in a mechanized way, whereby the corpses were to get there under the load of their own weight, by sliding on a refractory surface with an inclination of forty degrees. The corpses fell onto the grate, and burned under the effect of the fire. The corpses themselves were to serve as additional fuel.

Question: When did you go into mass production of the new crematorium system?

Answer: The Topf Company did not go on to manufacture the new crematorium I had designed, because in November 1942, I submitted my project to the patent office in Berlin, where it was not officially registered, and my invention was only put into practice there, but I don't know under which [patent] number, because I wasn't told.³⁷⁰

The interrogation ended at 23:20.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed accurately, was read to me in translation into my native language, and I sign it.

Interrogated by: The investigating judge of the "Smersh" service of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Morskoi Guard.

Interpreter: Datsyuk.

IV) INTERROGATIONS OF GUSTAV BRAUN

1) Interrogation Protocol dated 4 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Shatunovsky, Major Moruzhenko

Interpreter: Hofmeister

4 March 1946. We, chief of the 2nd section of the "Smersh" service of the 8th Guards Army, Captain of the Guard Shatunovsky and deputy chief of the 2nd section of the Guard Major Moruzhenko, interviewed as a witness

Braun, Gustav, son of Karl, born 1889, native of Heilbronn, member of a family of clerks, with higher education, German, German citizen, residing at Erfurt, Peterstrasse, 55.

[The interrogatee] was warned about liability for false statements (signed: Braun).

German-language interpreter Hofmeister was warned about responsibility for correctness of translation (signed: Hofmeister).

Question: Since when and in what position have you been working at the Topf Company?

Answer: I have been working as plant manager at the factory of the Topf Company in Erfurt since 1936. In 1941/1942, I was also the deputy of the counterintelligence representative,³⁷³ i.e. from the moment the boss Ludwig Topf went to Hungary on business.

Question: Who was the counterintelligence representative?

Answer: The counterintelligence representative was the aforementioned Ludwig Topf. He assigned me the task of deputy counterintelligence representative.

Question: Where are the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and his brother at present?

Answer: Ludwig Topf poisoned himself in June 1945³⁷⁴ when American troops moved in and the Americans wanted to arrest him. The second brother, Ernst Topf, went to a town near Kassel, stayed there and never returned.

Question: Name the most important products manufactured by the Topf Company!

Answer: The Topf factory in Erfurt produced equipment for breweries, mills and lifts for many years. It installed large factory pipes, furnaces for boiler operations in factories and furnaces for crematoria.

Question: How long has the company been producing cremation furnaces?

Answer: The company has been producing cremation furnaces for Germany and other countries for about forty years.

Question: How many crematoria were produced by the Topf Company from 1941 onwards?

Answer: I cannot give the exact number, but I know that crematoria were built in the concentration camps Buchenwald and Auschwitz, and repaired in Dachau.

³⁷³ Абверbeauftragтер, Abverbeauftragter, transliteration of Abwehrbeauftragter, counterintelligence representative.

³⁷⁴ Correct: 31 May.

Question: Who was the designer of stationary and mobile crematoria at the factory?

Answer: The designer of all types of crematoria was Engineer Prüfer. Engineer Schultze worked with him on the construction of crematoria. Engineer Sander was also involved in their manufacture.

Question: Did Prüfer and Schultze go to concentration camps to set up crematoria?

Answer: Yes.

Question: Were Prüfer and Schultze aware that living people were being exterminated in the crematoria?

Answer: In my opinion, they were informed.

My statements were transcribed accurately, they were read to me in German translation, and I sign them (signed: Braun³⁷⁵).

Interrogated by: The head of the 2nd section of the "Smersh" service of the 8th Guard Army, Guard Captain Shatunovsky (signed: Shatunovsky). The deputy head of the 2nd section of the Guard Major Moruzhenko (signed: Moruzhenko).

2) Interrogation Protocol dated 5 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Shatunovsky, Major Moruzhenko

Interpreter: Hofmeister

Question: When and by whom were you recruited to work as a deputy counterintelligence representative at the Topf Company in Erfurt?

Answer: In 1941, company boss Ludwig Topf, who was the factory's counterintelligence representative, called me into his office, and suggested that I should take on the job of deputy counterintelligence representative in the factory, and ensure that no acts of subversion or sabotage took place in the factory. In particular, he emphasized that no destruction of machinery should be permitted.

Question: How did you manage relations with the Gestapo as deputy counterintelligence representative?

Answer: I was put in contact with the Weimar counterintelligence office by counterintelligence representative Topf, and through the authorized signatory Max Machemehl, I was put in touch with SS Obersturmbannführer Wolf, the Gestapo liaison officer in Erfurt. Written documents that went from the company to the counterintelligence office and the Gestapo were regularly sent by mail or handed directly to Max Machemehl/Wolf.

Question: What demands were made of you personally by the Gestapo?

³⁷⁵ In the Russian original erroneously "Schultze."

Answer: Max Machemehl received letters from the Gestapo via Wolf, stating that they were addressed to him personally. In these letters, Wolf demanded reports on the political mood of both the German workers and the foreign workers working in the factory: their attitude to work, acts of subversion and sabotage committed by them, but also the factory's need for money and new machines.

Question: How were these Gestapo demands met?

Answer: Authorized signatory Max Machemehl, who was in direct contact with Wolf, turned to me as deputy counterintelligence representative, who, as head of all production in the factory, was in a position to have a complete overview of the political and production situation in the factory. In order to be able to inform Machemehl in detail about the political mood and cases of sabotage, I called in the workshop managers on behalf of Topf to support the work of the counterintelligence representative. In this way, I consulted the following workshop managers: The head of the metalworking shop, Begel Heinrich, 48-50 years old, non-party; the head of the carpentry shop, Liebeskind Hugo, 60 years old, non-party; the head of the aircraft-parts department, Breitruck, Willi [Beitrich, Wilhelm], 42 years old, non-party. When I asked them about the work of the counterintelligence representative, I pointed out to them that this work was carried out for the Gestapo and in their interests.

Question: Tell me about your practical work in the factory for the Gestapo!

Answer: As a result of my dealings with the Gestapo, one worker of German nationality – I don't remember his last name – and two foreign workers were arrested for sabotage. I wrote six reports for the Gestapo about the mood among the workers, and handed them over to Machemehl. I also informed the Gestapo via [Ludwig] Topf about four foreign workers who had absconded from the factory. I received information about the negative attitude of some of the workers towards their work from the workshop managers, who were called in by me for the work of the counterintelligence representative, and I passed this on to Machemehl for the Gestapo.

Question: Your official position was head of production at the factory. Were you also in charge of the crematorium [furnace] construction department?

Answer: Yes. As head of production (plant manager), I was in charge of all production in the factory, including the manufacture of furnaces for the crematoria.

My statements were transcribed accurately, read to me in German translation, and I sign them.

The interrogation was conducted through the German interpreter, who was warned about responsibility for the correctness of the translation (signed: Hofmeister).

Interrogated by: The head of the 2nd section of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Shatunovsky (signed: Shatunovsky). The deputy head of the 2nd section of the Guard Major Moruzhenko (signed: Moruzhenko).

3) Interrogation Protocol dated 7 March 1946

Interrogator: Second Lieutenant Malyshko

Interpreter: Negnevitski

I, operational representative of the second division of the “Smersh” service of the 30th Army, Lieutenant of the Guard Malyshko, have questioned the detainee Gustav Braun, son of Karl, born in Heilbronn in 1884. He is a member of a family of clerks, with higher education, engineer, German, German citizen.

Question: Where does your family currently live?

Answer: My family – my wife and two sons – currently live in Erfurt, Pitscherstrasse 55.

Question: What special training do you have?

Answer: I graduated from the technical college in Nuremberg in 1911, and obtained an engineering degree.

My statements are correctly reproduced in the transcript; this was read to me, which I confirm with my signature. (Signed Braun)

The interrogation was conducted through the German interpreter Negnewizki.

The interrogation was conducted by: The operational plenipotentiary of the 2nd Division of the “Smersh” Service of the 30th Army, Lieutenant of the Guard Malyshko.

4) Interrogation Protocol dated 11 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Morskoi

Interpreter: Galkin [Галкин]

Question: In which language would you like to make your statement?

Answer: I am German. Although I speak English, I will make my statements in German.

Question: Do you understand the interpreter introduced to you, and do you have no objections to him translating your statements?

Answer: I understand the interpreter well, and have no objections to him translating my statements.

Question: Which political parties and organizations were you a member of?

Answer: I did not belong to any political parties on German territory, but I was a member of the Nazi organization Labor Front.

Question: When did you join this organization?

Answer: I joined this National-Socialist organization in 1936, i.e. when I returned from America and started working in the factory of the Topf Company in Erfurt. I was a member of this organization until the capitulation of fascist Germany.

Question: What leading positions did you hold in the fascist organization Labor Front?

Answer: During the entire time I was a member of the National-Socialist organization Labor Front, I did not hold any leading positions in it.

Question: In what position did you work in the factory of the Topf Company?

Answer: I worked in the factory of the Topf Company from 1936 in the position of production manager.

Question: What kind of products did the Topf Company manufacture?

Answer: For many years, the Topf Company manufactured equipment for breweries, lifts and mills. It installed large factory pipes, furnaces for factory boiler rooms, and furnaces for crematoria.

Question: Who placed the orders for the production of furnaces for crematoria during the war between fascist Germany and the Soviet Union?

Answer: I cannot answer this question, because the orders for the production of furnaces were received by the head of the company, Ludwig Topf.

Question: Did the Topf Company manufacture cremation furnaces for the concentration camps?

Answer: Yes, the Topf Company manufactured cremation furnaces for the concentration camps.

Question: When did the Topf Company start manufacturing cremation furnaces for the concentration camps?

Answer: 1940 or 1941, I don't remember exactly.

Question: How many crematoria [cremation furnaces] were manufactured by the Topf Company for the concentration camps until Germany's capitulation?

Answer: I cannot give the exact number of crematoria [cremation furnaces] manufactured by the Topf Company from 1940/1941 until the capitulation of Germany, but I do know that the crematoria manufactured by our company were installed in the concentration camps Buchenwald and Auschwitz, and also repaired in Dachau.

Question: Who built crematoria [cremation furnaces] in the Topf factory?

Answer: The builder of all types of crematoria [cremation furnaces], both stationary and mobile, was engineer Prüfer at the factory of the Topf Company. Together with the latter, engineer Schultze worked on the construction of crematoria. Sander also helped Prüfer and Schultze.

Question: To what extent did Sander help these people in their work?

Answer: Sander, as chief engineer of the Topf Company and head of the crematorium construction department, reviewed the drawings and plans of the crematoria [cremation furnaces] made by Prüfer and Schultze, approved them himself, and then submitted these plans to Ludwig Topf for approval.

Question: What was your involvement as head of production at the factory in the construction of the crematoria [cremation furnaces] for the concentration camps?

Answer: As head of production at the Topf Company, I supervised and monitored the design and construction of the crematoria [cremation furnaces] to ensure that the orders were completed on time and in perfect quality. I personally checked the production of the crematoria [cremation furnaces], and then told Ludwig Topf that this or that order was ready.

Question: Who of the above-mentioned persons traveled to the concentration camps to assemble the crematoria [cremation furnaces]?

Answer: I know that Prüfer and Schultze traveled to the concentration camps three or four times before the crematoria [cremation furnaces] were assembled, but even after the assembly was completed, they traveled there to test the crematoria [cremation furnaces] they had built.

Question: When and to which camps did they go?

Answer: I don't remember exactly when they went, but I do know that they, i.e. Prüfer and Schultze, went to the concentration camps Buchenwald and Auschwitz.

Question: Did you know for what purpose the Topf Company, of which you were head of production, built crematoria [cremation furnaces] for the concentration camps?

Answer: I only knew that we built crematoria [cremation furnaces] for the concentration camps to burn corpses.

Question: Did you know that innocent people were exterminated and burned alive in the crematoria you built in the concentration camps?

Answer: I only found out about this after Germany's capitulation through the radio and newspapers.

Question: Did Prüfer and Schultze know about the above?

Answer: I assume that Prüfer and Schultze, who were in the concentration camps, knew that people were being exterminated and burned alive in the concentration-camp crematoria they had constructed.

The interrogation ends at 15:40.

The transcript with my statements was transcribed accurately, was read to me in my native language through the interpreter, and I sign it (signed: Braun).

Interrogated by: the investigating judge of the "Smersh" service of the 8th Guard Army, Captain of the Guard Morskoi (signed: Morskoi).

Interpreter: Galkin (signed: Galkin).

5) Interrogation Protocol dated 20 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Morskoi

Interpreter: Datsyuk

The interrogation begins at 14:00.

The interpreter was warned about the responsibility for unfaithful translation under Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Datsyuk).

Question: You are accused of having been directly involved in the design and construction of cremation furnaces for the concentration camps, in which the bodies of the completely innocent people of various nationalities were burned who had been tortured to death there. In addition, from 1941, you were deputy to the representative of the counterintelligence office in the aforementioned factory. In this function, you scouted out the political mood of the workers and people who had committed acts of sabotage at work, and were suspected of subversive activities. As a result of your denunciations, the Gestapo arrested one German and two foreign workers for sabotage at work. The crimes you committed fall under Article 58-2 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Republic. Do you understand the charges against you, and to what specifically have you pleaded guilty?

Answer: The charges brought against me on the basis of Article 58-2 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Republic have been explained to me by the interpreter in German and are comprehensible to me. I plead fully guilty to having been directly involved, during my work as head of production in the Topf company factory in Erfurt, in the design and construction of the cremation furnaces for the Buchenwald, Auschwitz, Dachau, Mauthausen and other concentration camps, in which the bodies of innocent people of various nationalities from different countries in Western Europe and the USSR were cremated, who had been tortured to death in the said concentration camps. I personally supervised the work on the construction of the cremation furnaces to ensure that the orders were carried out to a high standard and on time, after which I reported to the company boss Ludwig Topf on the fulfillment of the orders. In addition, from 1941 onwards, as deputy of the representative of the anti-espionage counterintelligence office,³⁷⁶ I scouted out the political mood among German and foreign workers and people who were suspected of sabotage and subversion at work. For this purpose, I had eight confidants among the workshop bosses. As a result of my work as deputy to the representative of the counterintelligence office, the Gestapo arrested one German and two foreign workers for sabotage at work. I also reported four foreign workers who had left the factory to the Gestapo as deputy to Ludwig Topf, the representative of the counterintelligence office.

The interrogation ended at 15:50.

Interrogated by: the investigating judge of the “Smersh” service of the 8th Guards Army, Guard Captain Morskoi (signed: Morskoi).

Interpreter: Datsyuk (signed: Datsyuk).

6) Interrogation Protocol dated 27 March 1946

Interrogator: Captain Kabanuyev³⁷⁷

Interpreter: Lieutenant Sherman

I, the investigating judge of the 2nd section of the 4th office of the counterintelligence service “Smersh” of the Soviet occupation troops group in Germany, Captain Kazantsev, questioned through the German-speaking interpreter Lieutenant Sherman the defendant

³⁷⁶ “Абверштелле,” Abwershtelle, counterintelligence office.

³⁷⁷ In the typewritten transcript of the interrogation appears the conjectural spelling Kabanuyev (indicated by italics), a character unknown in the criminal case records; it is more likely Kazantsev (Казанцев).

Braun, Karl, son of Karl.

Interpreter Sherman was admonished in accordance with Article 95 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Federative Soviet Republic (signed: Sherman).

Interrogation began at 12:00 noon and ended at 3:00, with a break from 4:00 to 8:00 p.m.

Question: Which German political organizations and parties were you a member of?

Answer: I was never a member of any German political parties. I was only a member of the mass organization Labor Front.

Question: Did you hold leading positions in the fascist organization Labor Front?

Answer: During my membership in this organization from 1936 until the capitulation of Germany, i.e. until May 1945, I did not hold any leading positions in it.

Question: Please tell us about your professional activities.

Answer: I was born in Germany in the town of Wartenberg. In 1926, I went to America, where I worked in New York and Chicago as a civil engineer building bridges and skyscrapers. I returned to Germany in 1936. I lived there in the city of Erfurt, and worked at the Topf Company from 1936 until Germany's capitulation in May 1945, where I held the position of production manager.

Question: What connection did you have with the German counterintelligence agencies as head of production at Topf?

Answer: When I was working as a production manager at the Topf Company, I was called in by the company boss Ludwig Topf in 1941 to work with the counterintelligence authorities, with whom I maintained relations until the beginning of 1945.

Question: What exactly was your connection with the counterintelligence authorities?

Answer: The head of the Topf Company, from whom I was called in to cooperate with the counterintelligence authorities, was at the same time the representative of the counterintelligence office, and was in charge of all the anti-espionage activities in the company. Topf Ludwig gave me the task of ensuring that there were no cases of subversion or sabotage in the factory. I also had to scout out the mood of the workers, and report on all anti-fascist statements made by the workers. In fact, I acted as deputy to the counterintelligence representative [Ludwig] Topf. If the latter was absent, I was in charge of the anti-espionage work in the company.

Question: What exactly did your practical work as deputy to the counterintelligence representative consist of?

Answer: My work as a counterintelligence representative consisted of the following: I systematically observed the mood among the workers, and reported to the counterintelligence office via the counterintelligence representative [Ludwig] Topf. I gave the foremen daily instructions to observe the workers as well, and report to me on their mood and behavior. But during the entire period of my work in the Topf Company, no cases of subversion or sabotage were discovered. The mood among the workers was always normal. Sharp anti-fascist statements were not registered. The workers behaved in a completely disciplined manner. There were no cases of arrests by the German prosecution authorities at the Topf Company.

Question: What items did the Topf Company produce?

Answer: Before the outbreak of war in 1939, the Topf Company was involved in the manufacture of crematoria, produced hand grenades and fulfilled other military orders. During the war with the USSR from 1941 to 1945, Topf fulfilled orders for the repair of airplanes, but also manufactured cremation furnaces.

Question: Where were the cremation furnaces delivered which had been built by the Topf Company?

Answer: The cremation furnaces manufactured by the Topf Company were delivered to the Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Dachau camps during the German-Soviet War, where, as I later learned from newspapers, Russian prisoners of war, prisoners of war from other nations, and civilians were exterminated.

Question: How do you know that the Topf Company built furnaces for the crematoria of the German death camps Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Dachau?

Answer: I know that the Topf Company built furnaces for the Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Dachau death camps from the correspondence that was conducted with the leaders of these camps on this occasion.

Question: Who placed the orders for the production of furnaces for the crematoria of these death camps?

Answer: I do not know from whom specifically, or from which organization, the orders came for the production of furnaces to equip the crematoria in the Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Dachau death camps.

My statements that were read to me in German were transcribed accurately in my own words (signed Gustav Braun).

Interpreter: Sherman.

Interrogated by: investigating judge of the 2nd section of the 4th office of the counter-intelligence service “Smersh” of the group of Soviet occupation troops in Germany, Captain Kabanuyev.³⁷⁷

7) Interrogation Protocol dated 12 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation began at 12:30. It ended at 18:00.

Question: Do you confirm the statements you made during the previous interrogations?

Answer: The statements I made during the interrogations after my arrest correspond to the facts, and I confirm them in full.

Question: How long and in what position did you work at the German Topf and Sons Company in Erfurt?

Answer: I worked in the German Topf and Sons Company in Erfurt from 1936 until the day of my arrest, i.e. until 9 March 1946. Initially, for ten or eleven months, I worked in the company as an assembly engineer, and then I was appointed head of the product manufacturing department. In German, my function is called “Betriebsleiter” (plant manager). In January 1940, the owner of the company, Ludwig Topf, promoted me, and appointed me production manager of the company, in German “Betriebsdirektor”. I worked in this position until I was arrested.

Question: What were your duties as production manager of the Topf Company?

Answer: As production manager of the Topf Company, I was in charge of the operations of the machine-building factory in Erfurt. I was responsible for hiring and firing workers for this company, and was responsible for the deadlines and quality of product manufacture in this factory.

Question: What relationship did you have with work carried out by the Topf Company directly at the client’s premises?

Answer: As production manager of the company, I personally had no relationship with such work. Such work was carried out by the Topf Company’s assembly office, which was headed by Engineer Max Schuchardt.

Question: However, the assembly office was directly subordinate to you, and its activities were directed and controlled by you. Why are you trying to conceal this in the investigation proceedings?

Answer: The assembly office was directly subordinate to the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and I personally had no connection whatsoever with the work carried out by this office.

Question: Your statements on this question do not correspond to reality. The organigram of the Topf Company, which is clearly presented to you, shows that the assembly office and other departments of the company, which ensured the production activities of the latter, were under your management, and were directed by you. Why are you trying to cover up this fact and conceal your role in managing the production activities of the Topf Company?

Answer: In the organigram submitted to me, my official position as production manager of the company is incorrectly presented. I only managed the production activities of the mechanical engineering department of the Topf Company. The [other] departments of the company – the work preparation department, the assembly office, the standardization office, the purchasing and shipping departments were not subordinate to me, and I had no connection whatsoever with their activities. The departments I just mentioned reported directly to the head of the company, Ludwig Topf.³⁷⁸

Question: It is known that the Topf Company's assembly office carried out work on the construction of crematoria and gas chambers in the concentration camps, and that you, as production manager, were responsible for the general management of this work. Please make truthful statements!

Answer: I do not deny that for several years, especially from 1941 to 1943, the assembly office of the Topf Company was involved in building crematoria in German concentration camps and equipping some of them, especially Auschwitz, with gas chambers. However, as I have already explained, I had no connection whatsoever with this work, because the assembly office was not under my management.

Question: The statements of witnesses – P. Ertman, G. Mairer,³⁷⁹ H. Schmidt, O. Back and A. Risljand³⁸⁰ – convict you of making false statements. Excerpts from the interview transcript of these witnesses will [now]

³⁷⁸ Braun's statements were at least partially correct. According to the organigram of the Topf Company dated 22 February 1943, the company department (Betriebsabteilung), headed by a company management (Betriebsleitung), at the head of which stood Braun precisely as company manager, was a department in its own right, on a par with the assembly department (Montage-Abteilung). The standards department (Normenstelle) depended on the general administration (Allgemeine Verwaltung), as did the main-purchasing department (Haupteinkauf), while the dispatch department depended on the technical departments (Technische Abteilungen). The work-preparation department (Arbeitsvorbereitung), on the other hand, was directly subordinate to Braun. Reproduction of the document in Schüle, p. 167 be read to you. Those responsible for conducting the investigation demand that you make truthful statements.

Answer: I know the witnesses Paul Ertman, G. Mairer, Hermann Schmidt, Otto Back and Albert Risljand from our work together at the Topf and Sons Company. There were and are no personal disputes between me and them. I declare once again to those charged with conducting the investigation that the assembly office was not under my control, and that I had no connection with the work carried out by this office. I am unable to explain why the above-mentioned witnesses made statements in response to the question posed that are completely contrary to mine.

8) Interrogation Protocol dated 17 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation began at 12:10. It ended at 17:30.

Question: Where did you live before you started working for the Topf and Sons Company, and what work did you do then?

Answer: Until 1936, i.e. before I started working for the German engineering company Topf and Sons. I lived in the USA, where I worked as a metal construction engineer in various factories.

Question: When and why did you leave the USA?

Answer: I emigrated to Argentina in 1924 because of unemployment in Germany, and because of a contract with the German company Thyssen to work in their factories in Buenos Aires. I worked in these factories as a steel-construction engineer until 1927. Then I resigned and moved to New York, where I found a job as an engineer with an American bridge-construction company. I lived and worked in the USA for 9 years. Then, in April 1936, I returned to Germany, where I lived until the day I was arrested.

Question: What prompted you to leave the USA and return to Germany?

Answer: My parents, who were raising my son, were living in Germany. I actually only intended to visit them and then return to America and take my son with me. But after I arrived in Germany, the Nazi government passed a law prohibiting German citizenship specialists from traveling abroad. Because of this law, I was not allowed to return to America. As a result, I was forced to stay in Germany and look for a job there.

Question: During your stay in Argentina and the USA, did you maintain relations with German diplomats in these countries?

Answer: I did not have any relations with German diplomats in Argentina and the USA. Of course, there were cases where I contacted the German embassy to obtain a passport after emigrating to the USA. At the moment, I can't remember in which years this happened.

Question: After your return to Germany, were you summoned by the Gestapo or any other authorities in connection with your stay abroad?

Answer: After my return to Germany, I was not summoned by any authorities, and I was not questioned in connection with my stay abroad.

Question: Did you serve in the German army?

Answer: I served in the German army from 1914 to 1918 as an ordinary artilleryman. I did not serve in the German army during the Second World War, because I was no longer required to serve due to my age.

Question: Which of your relatives served in the German army during the Second World War?

Answer: In 1939, my son Hans Braun, born in 1920, was drafted into the German army. He served as a private in an anti-aircraft platoon, and was a member of his unit in France. In 1945, he became an American prisoner of war. I don't know where he is now. My son was a member of the Hitler Youth. Apart from my son, none of my relatives served in the German army during this time.

Question: Who were your parents?

Answer: My parents were of German nationality and, like me, German citizens. My father Karl Braun worked in an appliance-manufacturing factory in Heilbronn (near Stuttgart). He died in 1943. My mother was a housewife. She died in 1939.

The interrogation protocol has been read to me in German translation; my statements are accurately reproduced therein. (signed Braun)

9) Interrogation Protocol dated 26 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation began at 16:00. The interrogation ended at 22:10 pm.

Question: We are presenting you with documents originating from the management of the Topf Company, in which a list of orders carried out by said company is mentioned. Tell me, what are these documents, and what part did you personally play in their preparation?

Answer: The documents presented to me, which are printed on rolled-up sheets of parchment paper, are individual pages of Topf's production plans, which were prepared by the company's general planning office. These plans contain a list of orders received by the company from various organizations, and the deadlines for their execution. These production plans were drawn up by the general planning office together with the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and confirmed by the latter. I personally did not participate in any way in their preparation and creation.

Question: Were you made aware of these production plans?

Answer: No, these plans were considered secret, and I was not made privy to them.

Question: How could you manage the company's production activities if you didn't know their production plans?

Answer: I did not claim that I was completely unaware of the company's production plans. In those cases where the company accepted an order of any kind, the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, or his brother Ernst Topf (the co-owner of the company) informed me, and coordinated the possible deadlines for the execution of these orders with me. In some cases, the technical departments of the Topf Company, through which the orders received from customers were processed, coordinated certain issues with me, for example regarding the deadlines or the availability of material for the execution of this or that order. At the same time, in my capacity as the company's production manager, I gathered the foremen every morning for a meeting to discuss issues relating to their work over the next few days. The focus [of the meeting] was on the necessary execution of individual orders that the [work preparation department] had already handed over directly to the factory workshops. These meetings were attended by the head of the [work preparation department], who handed over the orders to the workshops and checked the deadlines for their completion. In this way, I was generally kept up to date with the company's production plans, although I was not made aware of the plans drawn up by the company's general planning office.

Question: So you were also aware that the Topf and Sons Company was carrying out orders from SS authorities for the concentration camps?

Answer: Yes, as head of production at Topf and Sons, I knew that this company received and carried out orders from SS authorities for the concentration camps Buchenwald, Dachau and Auschwitz (KL Oswiecim).

Question: What were these orders, and what part did you play in carrying them out?

Answer: In the years 1940-1943, the Topf and Sons Company built incineration furnaces on behalf of SS authorities in the aforementioned concentration camps. As the company's head of production, I personally supervised the production of the metal parts for these furnaces in the workshops of the company factory.

Question: By whom in the Topf Company and under whose direction were the incinerators built in the concentration camps mentioned?

Answer: To carry out this work, the company's assembly office sent specialists to the concentration camps Buchenwald, Dachau and Auschwitz, mainly fitters and bricklayers. The technical supervision and management of this work was carried out by the chief engineers of the Topf construction office, Kurt Prüfer and Schulze.

Question: Were these specialists from the company's assembly office sent to the concentration camps with your knowledge?

Answer: With my knowledge, only fitters and the chief fitter Heinrich Messing, who were part of my staff, were sent to carry out the work on the construction and assembly of the cremation furnaces. Other skilled workers, such as fitters for the construction of furnaces and bricklayers, were sent to the concentration camps without my knowledge, because the assembly office was not subordinate to me.

Question: On behalf of SS authorities, two cremation furnaces for the concentration camps Dachau and Mauthausen were produced directly in the workshops of the company factory, as well as two eight-muffle furnaces for the crematoria of the Auschwitz Camp. What part did you personally play in the planning and manufacture of these furnaces?

Answer: In fact, in 1940 or 1941 (I don't remember exactly), two mobile cremation furnaces were manufactured in the factory of the Topf Company on behalf of SS authorities, which were intended for the Dachau Camp. But when these furnaces were assembled, we sent one of them to the Mauthausen Concentration Camp on the instructions of the SS authorities in Berlin. My part in the construction of these two furnaces was as follows: I made a room available on the factory premises where the assembly of these furnaces took place, provided Prüfer with locksmiths for the assembly work, and supervised the production and machining of the metal frames and various individual parts for the aforementioned furnaces. The eight-muffle furnaces for the crematorium of the Auschwitz death camp were not manufactured in the factory of the Topf and Sons Company. The necessary metal parts and individual components for these furnaces were manufactured and machined in the workshops of the company's factory. The aforementioned work was also carried out with my knowledge and under my direct supervision. The shipment of the mobile cremation furnaces to the concentration camps Dachau and Mauthausen, and the shipment of the metal parts and spare parts for the cremation furnaces built by our company in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, were the responsibility of the so-called shipping office, which was under the control of the boss Ludwig Topf.

Question: What equipment for the gas chambers built by the Topf and Sons Company in the concentration camps was manufactured in the factory of this company?

Answer: Under my direction, ventilation devices for air intake and extraction were built in the factory of the Topf Company, which, as I later learned, were installed in the gas chambers at Auschwitz. The chief engineer of the Topf Company, Karl Schulze, was responsible for the construction and drawings of these devices.

Question: Who was in charge of the assembly of these devices in Auschwitz?

Answer: I selected the fitter Heinrich Messing to carry out the assembly of these ventilation devices, and sent him to the Auschwitz Camp. The latter carried out the assembly work under the direct supervision of Chief Engineer K. Schulze, who traveled to the Auschwitz Camp several times especially for this purpose.

Question: Did you personally have to go to the concentration camps?

Answer: No, I personally never went to a single concentration camp.

Question: What issues did you have to resolve together with Engineer Kurt Prüfer with regard to the construction and equipment of the camp crematoria?

Answer: As far as I remember, the chief engineer of the Topf Company, Kurt Prüfer, approached me with the following questions in connection with the construction and equipment of the camp crematoria:

1. Since various metal parts and individual components for the cremation furnaces built in the concentration camps were produced under my guidance in the workshops of the Topf Company's factory on behalf of the SS authorities, Prüfer turned to me in a number of cases to clarify the deadlines, within which these or those parts could be manufactured and sent to the construction site. In such cases, I always provided Kurt Prüfer with the necessary information on the issues falling within his area of responsibility.

2. There were cases where Prüfer, after the SS authorities had ordered the production of these or those metal parts for the camp crematoria, discussed with me what kind of iron or steel these parts should be made of.

There were also cases where, at his request, I provided Prüfer with fitters (2 men) for the assembly of the cremation furnaces.

Question: During this interrogation, you referred to a number of facts which prove and confirm your direct involvement in the execution of the orders by SS authorities in the construction and equipping of the crematoria in the concentration camps. Why did you deny these facts in your personal confrontation with the defendant Kurt Prüfer?

Answer: During my personal confrontation with the defendant Kurt Prüfer, I denied the facts he cited concerning my direct involvement in carrying out the orders by SS authorities to build and equip the camp crematoria, because I no longer remembered them well, and because I was afraid that a confession might incriminate me even more. After my confrontation in person, I reconsidered everything and decided to make truthful statements to the court of inquiry.

Question: How many crematoria were built and equipped by the Topf Company in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp with your involvement?

Answer: As a lot of time has passed since then, I cannot answer this question precisely. I only know that all orders from SS authorities for the construction and equipment of the crematoria and gas chambers in the Auschwitz Camp were carried out in full by the Topf and Sons Company. I have already stated my involvement in the execution of this work.

Question: We are presenting you with photocopies of parts of a correspondence between the Topf and Sons Company and the Construction Office of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, which show that, between 1940 and 1943, the company built and equipped five powerful crematoria with gas chambers in the said camp, in which more than 4,700 prisoners were exterminated every day. What can you say about the documents presented to you?

Answer: The documents presented to me do indeed show that five powerful crematoria were built by the Topf and Sons Company with my participation in the Auschwitz death camp, in which more than 4,700 prisoners were exterminated every day. I recognize that the aforementioned documents also convict me of having participated in the work of creating and building the technical means used by the SS men to exterminate innocent people imprisoned in the concentration camps.

The interrogation protocol was read to me in German translation; my statements are accurately reproduced in it (signed Braun).

The interrogation was conducted by: Chief Operative Plenipotentiary of the 4th Department of the 3rd Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed Doperchuk).

Present at the interrogation as German interpreter was the operational plenipotentiary of the 4th Department of the 3rd Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Kush (signed Kush).

10) Interrogation Protocol dated 28 February 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The interrogation started at 15:10 and ended at 18:20.

Question: At an earlier date, you were presented with the charges brought against you under Article 58-2 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic. The charges against you are as follows:

1. As head of production of the Topf and Sons Company, from 1940 to 1943, you participated directly in the organization and execution of work carried out by said company in the concentration camps for the construction and equipment of crematoria and gas chambers, in which mass extermination of completely innocent people took place.

2. You harassed citizens of the USSR and other countries who had been forcibly mobilized to work in the factory of the Topf Company: You supervised them and forced them to perform forced labor.

3. In 1941, as deputy to the counterintelligence representative, you directed the anti-espionage activities and the fight against acts of sabotage and subversion in the factory of the Topf and Sons Company, and informed the authorities of the SD and the Gestapo about the mood among the workers of the company.

Do you plead guilty to the acts of which you are accused?

Answer: Article 58-4 of the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic has been explained to me, and I understand the substance of the charges against me.

I plead guilty:

a) As production manager of the Topf and Sons Company, to have participated directly in the organization and execution of work carried out by said company in the concentration camps Buchenwald, Mauthausen, Dachau and Auschwitz for the construction of crematoria, and also to have organized the manufacture of the necessary equipment for these crematoria in the company factory at the order of SS authorities.

b) In compliance with the instructions of company boss Ludwig Topf, to have ordered foreign workers, including citizens of the USSR, who were forcibly mobilized to work in the company factory and who were under my command, to perform forced labor, to have ordered the workshop managers to carefully observe the behavior of these workers, and to have demanded that the workers perform the production tasks in a qualitatively flawless manner. The aforementioned foreign workers were kept under guard in the factory warehouse, called in to do various auxiliary work on my instructions, and paid 20 to 30% less than the German workers for this work.

c) After I was called in by the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, to act as deputy counterintelligence representative in the company factory, I was in charge of anti-espionage activities and the fight against acts of sabotage and subversion, and furthermore, with Ludwig Topf's knowledge, I reported to the SD representative Machemehl on the mood of the company workers.

With regard to the accusation made against me that I participated in the work of equipping gas chambers in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, I declare that, as I later learned, the equipment for these chambers was procured directly by the chief engineer of the Topf Company, Schultze Karl, on whose instructions the fitter Messing Heinrich was assigned to me for the purpose of carrying out the work of installing the ventilation equipment. I did not know that these devices were installed in gas chambers in which the SS men poisoned prisoners with gas.

Question: Were the ventilation devices mentioned manufactured by the Topf and Sons Company?

Answer: Yes, these ventilation devices were manufactured under my leadership in the factory of the Topf Company, and as the orders by the SS authorities show, they were intended for the Auschwitz Concentration Camp. I did not know that they were intended to equip the gas chambers in Auschwitz.

The interrogation report was read to me in German translation; my statements are accurately reported there.

Interrogated by: The operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed: Doperchuk). The military prosecutor of the Supreme Court of the USSR Justice Lieutenant Colonel Novikov (signed: Novikov).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush (signed: Kush).

11) Interrogation Protocol dated 10 March 1948

Interrogator: Lieutenant Colonel Novikov

Interpreter: Lieutenant Kush

The Interrogation started at 14:30 and ended at 24:15 [sic]

Question: Explain when and by whom you were called in to work as deputy to the counterintelligence representative in the Topf and Sons Company!

Answer: I was called in by the owner of the company, Ludwig Topf, in the fall of 1941 to work as deputy to the counterintelligence representative in the Topf and Sons Company.

Question: What was Ludwig Topf's relationship to the work of the counterintelligence authorities?

Answer: As the owner of the company, Ludwig Topf was in contact with the counterintelligence authorities, and was a representative of these authorities for anti-espionage activities in the factories and buildings of his company. He apparently chose me as his deputy in the area of counterintelligence, because I was the company's head of production, directly managed the engineering factory, and had closer contact than others with the workers and workshop managers working in the company's factories.

Question: What did you do in practice as deputy to the counterintelligence representative?

Answer: On Ludwig Topf's instructions, I took measures to prevent possible acts of subversion and sabotage in the factory and other production facilities of the company. To this end, I personally instructed the workshop managers to check the machines and lathes several times a day, but also to monitor the behavior of the workers. I demanded particularly close observation and control from them with regard to the foreign workers who had been forcibly mobilized to work in Germany. I reported all this to Ludwig Topf, as well as the mood among the workers, which the workshop managers regularly reported to me.

Question: Were you only in contact with Ludwig Topf during your counterintelligence work?

Answer: Yes, during my counterintelligence work, I was only in contact with Ludwig Topf. At the same time, with Ludwig Topf's knowledge, I gave the authorized signatory Max Machemehl verbal reports on the state and work at the factories of the Topf and Sons Company on several occasions. Machemehl was an authorized representative or agent of the Erfurt SD office.

Question: Please report on this in more detail!

Answer: In 1944, I can't remember exactly when, the authorized signatory Max Machemehl, head of the commercial department of the Topf Company, came to see me, and in a conversation with me, he was interested in the production process and the mood of the workers in the company's factory. I told him that everything was in perfect order in the factory, and that I had never heard any negative comments from the workers. After two or three months, Max Machemehl came to me again and asked the same questions. Instead of an answer, I asked him to see the head of the company, Ludwig Topf, and informed him of Machemehl's demands. In response to [Ludwig] Topf's question as to why he was so interested in these matters, Max Machemehl presented him with a letter signed by the head of the SD in Erfurt, SS Obersturmbannführer Wolf. This letter stated that he, meaning M. Machemehl, absolutely had to submit reports to the SD on the state of the Topf and Sons Companies. Ludwig Topf then suggested that I inform M. Machemehl about the questions that interested him. I then informed M. Machemehl, in the presence of Ludwig Topf, that workers at the company factory had expressed their dissatisfaction in conversations about the reduction in food rations and the deterioration in their food supply, and that, as a result, productivity in the factory was falling noticeably. Two to three months after this conversation, I met M. Machemehl by chance on the way to the company's management building. During the conversation, he informed me that, at the request of SS Obersturmbannführer Wolf, he had to report to the SD department on the existence of metal-raw-material stocks in the company, and had already received information on this from the accounting office. Machemehl apparently told me this, because the question of the availability of metal raw materials and the supply of these to the company fell within my area of responsibility as the company's head of production. Apart from these three cases, I did not speak to Max Machemehl again and did not give him any more reports to pass on to the SD department.

In March 1946, Max Machemehl was arrested by the Soviet administration in Erfurt, after which there was a confrontation between him and myself concerning the question I mentioned.

Question: Were there any cases of sabotage or subversion in the industrial plants of Topf and Sons Company?

Question: Then why were one German and two foreign workers who worked in the Topf Company's factory arrested following your denunciation?

Answer: No Topf workers were arrested in response to my denunciation.

Question: During the interrogations on 5 and 20 March 1946, you stated that, as a result of your work as deputy to the counterintelligence representative, one German and two foreign workers were arrested by the German authorities for sabotage. Why are you now trying to cover up these facts?

Answer: During the interrogations on 5 and 20 March 1946, I stated that two of the foreign workers at the Topf Company's factory had been arrested. One, whose last name was Kusmenko, was arrested on the instructions of the company boss, because he had argued with a German worker at work and had beaten him up. The second worker, who was Russian by nationality (I don't remember his last name), was arrested at night by the Gestapo, reportedly for participating in the preparation of the distribution of anti-fascist leaflets. I also reported that a German worker who was employed as a guard was dismissed for loafing. It may be that the interpreter or the officer who interrogated me did not understand what I said and did not write it down correctly. I did not testify during the investigation that the arrests I mentioned were the result of my denunciations as deputy counterintelligence representative, because in reality I had nothing to do with these arrests.

Question: During the interrogation on 5 March 1946, you testified that you had reported to the Gestapo, via Ludwig Topf, the escape of four foreign workers from the factory, and that you had given Max Machemehl a report on the mood of the workers in the factory six times. Do these statements of yours correspond to reality?

Answer: This part of my statements largely corresponds to reality, but has not been written down correctly. I did indeed report to Ludwig Topf about the escape of four foreign workers (two Russians and two Frenchmen) from the factory in 1944, and the police and Gestapo were informed immediately, so that the necessary tracing measures could be initiated. I also told Max Machemehl about this incident. As for the reports on the mood of the workers at the Topf Company, I only gave him two such reports, as I had already testified before. I can't explain why the minutes of the interrogation of 5 March 1946 say that I reported to him six times.

Question: Did you know Johanna Büschleb, the employee of the Topf and Sons Company?

Answer: I knew the employee of Topf and Sons Johanna Büschleb. She worked as the personal secretary, typist and stenographer for the head of the company, Ludwig Topf. My relationship with Büschleb was purely business-related. There was no personal contact between us.

Question: The minutes of the interrogation of the witness Büschleb Johanna on 11 March 1946 will be read to you. Tell me in what matters you and Ludwig Topf corresponded with the Gestapo!

Answer: I never had any correspondence with Gestapo authorities. Personally, I merely informed Ludwig Topf from time to time about the mood of the workers and the condition of the equipment in the factory, as I have already stated. There is no doubt that Ludwig Topf used my information for a written report to the Gestapo. But he drew up this report without my involvement.

Question: When and in what numbers were foreign workers brought in to work at the Topf and Sons Company?

Answer: There were about 270 foreign workers in the Topf Company's factory. The first of these came to us in small groups of 20 to 30 men in 1941.

Question: What nationalities did these workers belong to, and how were they made available to the company?

Answer: The foreign workers were supplied to work in the Topf Company's factory by the employment office. The first group of foreign workers supplied to the company consisted exclusively of French prisoners of war. There were thirty of them. This was in 1941. Later, workers from Belgium, Holland, Russia and Italy joined us in small groups. By the end of 1942, there were around 270 people. They all worked in the factory until Germany's capitulation. There were about 70 Russians among these workers.

Question: To whom were these workers directly subordinate, and who distributed them to the workplaces?

Answer: All the foreign workers working in the factory were subordinate to me, and were assigned by me with the participation of the authorized representative of the Nazi party (factory manager) [Eduard] Pudenz. The majority of these workers were assigned by me to do unskilled labor in the factory workshops. Some of them were employed as metalworkers, lathe operators, etc.

Question: Where and under what conditions were these workers housed?

Answer: The foreign workers employed in the plants of the Topf and Sons Company were housed in six wooden barracks in a specially built factory camp, and guarded by the police. They were poorly fed. All these workers were assigned by me to groups of two to three skilled German workers from the company, who assigned them specific tasks on my instructions, and supervised their work. Initially, the forty-eight-hour week was set for the foreign workers, just as it was for the Germans, but later, from the end of 1942, the fifty-six-hour week was introduced for them at the behest of the German authorities. They received 25 to 30% less pay than the company's permanent workers. They were only paid a small proportion of this, as almost all of their wages were spent on their food and other benefits.

Question: Were there any conflicts between these workers and the Topf Company's administration?

Answer: During the entire period, there was only one conflict between the foreign workers and the Topf Company's administration, and that was in 1943. The following happened then: Because of the poor diet, the foreign workers refused to go to work as a group. When they reported this to me, I personally went to the camp barracks, and convinced myself that the food for the workers was very poorly prepared, whereupon I instructed the camp administration to feed them better. I then negotiated with the workers and persuaded them to go to work. In this way, I resolved the conflict without the use of force.

Question: Did you report this conflict to the Gestapo?

Answer: No, I personally reported it to company boss Ludwig Topf. I don't know whether he then reported the conflict to the Gestapo.

Question: Were repressive measures taken against the participants in this hunger riot?

Answer: No, there were none.

Question: Were there any arrests of foreign workers?

Answer: Of the foreign workers who worked at the Topf and Sons Company, only two people were arrested during the entire period, citizens of the USSR, as I have already noted. The Ukrainian worker Kusmenko, who was arrested by the police for beating up a German worker, was not detained for more than a week, and was then released. He then continued to work in the company factory until Germany's capitulation. I know nothing about the fate of the second worker who was arrested by the Gestapo, reportedly for participating in the production and distribution of anti-fascist leaflets. Rumor has it that this worker was connected to some underground organization that existed in another German factory. This organization was uncovered by the Gestapo, and the worker was subsequently arrested.

Question: As deputy counterintelligence representative in the Topf Company, did you have agents among these foreign workers?

Answer: No, I didn't have any such agents. I only asked the workshop managers to observe the behavior of the foreign workers while they were working in the company's workshops, and to monitor their work.

Question: Were there adolescents among the foreign workers employed in factories of the Topf Company?

Answer: There were 12 adolescents aged between 14 and 17 among the foreign workers employed in the factory of the Topf Company, all of them Russians. Outwardly, they all appeared physically strong and mature, which is why they were deployed under the same conditions as the adult workers. Two adolescents aged 14 to 15 worked eight hours a day, because they were assigned to the apprentice workshop, where they also learned the turning and metalworking trades.

Question: How did you personally treat the foreign workers who worked in the factory of the Topf and Sons Company?

Answer: As head of production at the company, I personally required these workers to have a positive attitude to their work, and to complete their production tasks to a satisfactory standard and on time. To this end, I assigned them to the workshop managers and individual skilled workers in the company factory, who monitored their work.

Question: What sanctions or punishments did you impose on these workers for misconduct?

Answer: We, meaning myself and the workshop managers, reprimanded and in some cases punished the foreign workers for their bad attitude to work, absenteeism, etc. No other sanctions were imposed.

Question: Were these workers beaten?

Answer: There were cases where the commandant of the factory camp [Wilhelm] Buchröder and the supervisor Wittermann, who looked after the condition of the factory equipment, beat foreign workers. I never beat any of these workers. I would like to add that Buchröder and Wittermann were arrested by the Soviet army authorities after Red-Army units marched into Erfurt.

Question: Who were Buchröder and Wittermann under?

Answer: Camp commander Buchröder was an employee of the S.A., but was paid by the Topf and Sons Company. As commander of the camp, he reported to the relevant S.A. authorities, but also to the company boss Ludwig Topf. The supervisor Wittermann was subordinate to me.

Question: The statements of Paul Erdmann, G. Mairer, H. Schmidt, O. Back and A. Risland about the situation of the foreign workers in the Topf Company's factory and your treatment of these workers were read out to you. What would you like to say to the investigating authority about the statements of the witnesses mentioned?

Answer: The statements of the above-mentioned witnesses about the camps of foreign workers at Topf and Sons Company are essentially correct. As far as my treatment of these workers is concerned, the witnesses did not testify correctly. I have indeed always demanded a positive attitude towards work, and a qualitatively satisfactory fulfillment of production tasks from all workers. I also made these demands of the foreign workers, but I was not rude to them, and do not remember any cases where I personally scolded any of them. I have already stated that almost all foreign workers were called in by the company to do unskilled work, and were assigned by me to the workshop managers and individual skilled workers of German nationality for this purpose. Therefore, if this or that production task was not completed on time, I only discussed it with these workshop managers or skilled workers, and not with the foreign workers. There were two young people aged 14 to 15 and about ten aged 16 to 17 among the Russian citizens, or more precisely the citizens of the USSR, working in the company's factory. The two 14 to 15-year-old adolescents were assigned by me to the apprentice workshop, where they learned the lathe and locksmith trades. They worked eight hours a day.

The interrogation report was read to me in German translation; my statements are accurately reported therein (signed: Braun).

Interrogated by: The operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR Lieutenant Colonel Doperchuk (signed: Doperchuk). The military prosecutor of the Supreme Court of the USSR Justice Lieutenant Colonel Novikov (signed: Novikov).

The interrogation was attended as a German-speaking interpreter by the operations officer of the 4th section of the 3rd Central Office of the Ministry of State Security of the USSR, Lieutenant Kush (signed: Kush).

Beschreibung der Fa. F.A. TOPF & Sohne, Erfurt

Die Herren TOPF, Ludwig und Ernst-Wolfgang waren die Besitzer und Chefs der Firma und leiteten diese unmittelbar.

Beide Herren verfügten über die Bearbeitung der Aufträge, die von der Fa. in der Fabrik hergestellt werden sollen.

Von hier wurde bestimmt welche Aufträge angenommen und welche abgelehnt werden sollen.

Das unmittelbar unterstellte Sekretariat, von 2 Damen besetzt, gab die Anweisung der Herren TOPF, an die einzelnen Abteilungen weiter und hier wurde ausserdem die ein- und auslaufende Briefpost erledigt und die Personalsachen der Mitarbeiter /Angestellte und Arbeiter/ bearbeitet.

Die Stelle Generalplan prüfte die eingegangenen Aufträge, gemeinsam mit TOPF über Annahme oder Ablehnung und ordnet dies falls angenommen, in eine Dringlichkeitsstufe. Hier wurden ausserdem die Kontrollmarken oder Scheine, entgegengenommen und weitergeleitet. Dieses Büro war das wichtigste in der Fa. und wurde von Herrn MERSCH geleitet.

Gemeinsam mit der Stelle Generalplan lief das Büro Betriebsdirektion.

Der Betriebsdirektor als Leiter des ganzen Betriebes (mit Ausnahme der technischen Büros) hatte die Bearbeitung der Aufträge innerhalb des Fabrikbetriebes zu überwachen und mit zu bestimmen, welche Aufträge vordringlich und welche für den Betrieb nicht geeignet, daher abzulehnen sind. Ausserdem wurden von hier aus die Arbeiten an die einzelnen Betriebsstellen verteilt und die Herstellungsweise durchgesprochen und festgelegt. Hier wurden auch die Arbeiter angenommen und entlassen. Ausserdem die Bearbeitungsmaschinen und die Werkzeuge der gesamten Fabrik kontrolliert und Vorschläge zur Verbesserung und Auswechslung dieser vorgenommen.

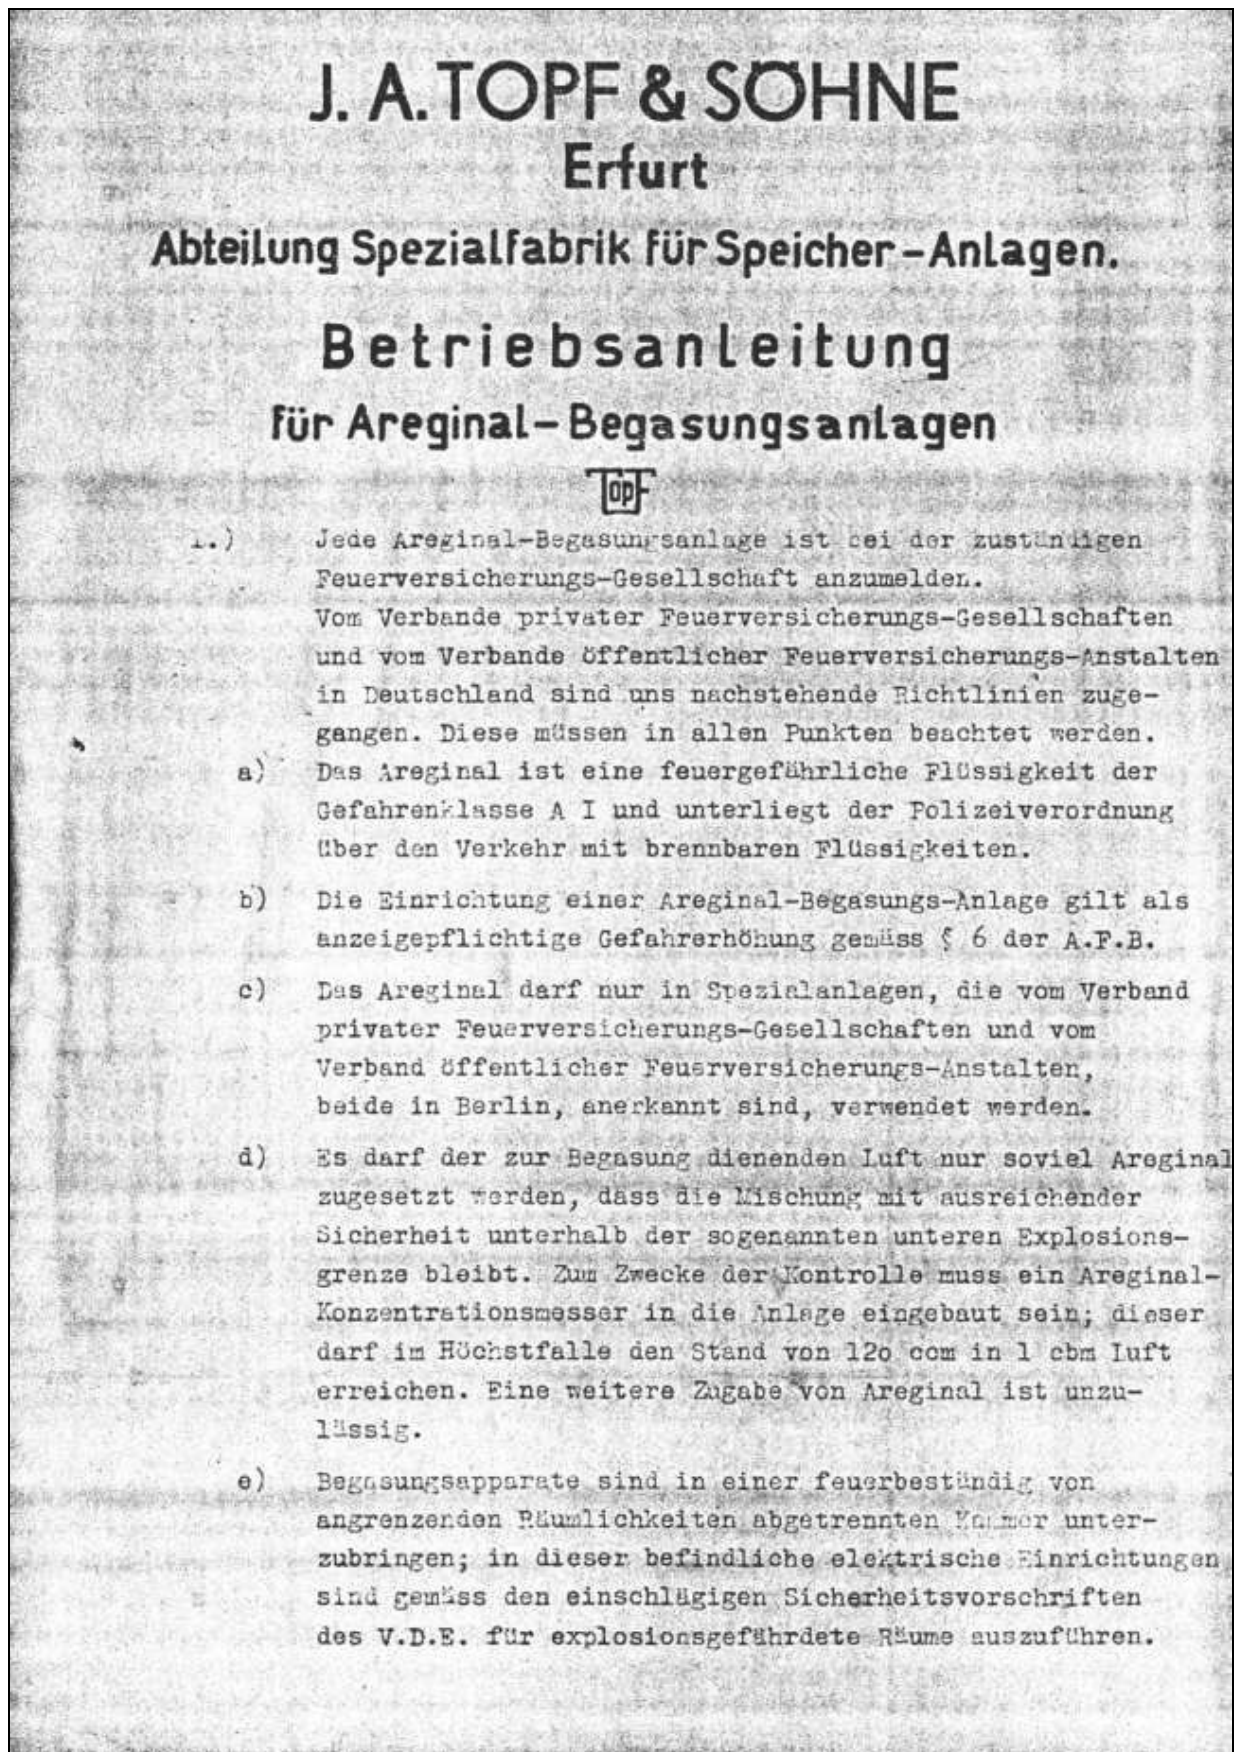

Im Büro der Arbeitsvorbereitung wurden die anzufertigen Maschinenteile in die einzelnen Arbeitsgänge zergliedert, die Kosten für die Bearbeitung der Teile festgelegt, also die Akkordlöhne festgesetzt, die Stücklisten und die Werkstattzeichnungen überprüft und Fehler richtig gestellt und geprüft, welche auf Vorrat liegenden Maschinenteile Verwendung finden sollen.

A.

Ich, Kurt Prüfer als Oberingenieur in der Maschinenbau-Abteilung, bei der Fa. F.A. Topf u. Söhne, Erfurt beschäftigt, hatte im Auftrage der Herren Topf mit Herrn Betriebsdirektor Braun folgende geschäftliche Angelegenheiten zu besprechen und zu behandeln.

- 1) Gestellung von Helfern und Schlossermontören, so im Jahre 1940, Helfer für die Baustelle Auschwitz, desgl. auch im Jahr 1942 und 1943 (Frühjahr).
- 2) Weiter wurden die Reklamationen der Montöre über nicht passende Eisenteile, die entweder in der Fabrik, oder durch fehlerhafte Aufgabe beziehungsweise Zeichnung, auf die Baustelle kamen, besprochen und hierbei die Fehlerquelle festgestellt. Diesen Besprechungen ging meistens ein von Herrn Braun ausgearbeiteter schriftlicher Bericht über die Herren Topf, voraus. Wie mir erinnerlich im Herbst 42 und Frühjahr 43 betreffend Baustelle Auschwitz und Baustelle Mauthausen.
- 3) Für die Anfertigung von Schamottebrücken für die Muffeln der Ofen, die im Allgemeinen auf dem Werk in Erfurt mittels der Schamotte-Masse "Monolit" hergestellt wurden, fand mit Herrn Braun eine Aussprache über den Herstellungsplatz der Brücken, als auch über den Arbeiter, der die Anfertigung vornahm, statt. Diese ^{Ersatz} Teile wurden laufend angefertigt. So im Jahre 1942, und 43 für die Lager Dachau und Auschwitz.
- 4) Da während der Kriegszeit unser reichhaltiges Eisenlager nahezu aufgebraucht war und die gänglichen Eisensorten wie E u, L Winkel, T Eisen, I Doppel-Eisen, = Flacheisen nicht immer zu haben waren, so mußte mit Herrn Braun besprochen werden, welche Eisen, die vorrätig waren und nicht für andere Kommissionen Verwendung fanden bzw. schon vorgesehen, genommen werden konnten. Diese Fragen waren hauptsächlich in den Jahren Herbst 42 u. Frühjahr 43 konkret.

- 5.) Auch wurden mit Herrn Braun Terminfragen erledigt, Herbst 42 u. Frühjahr 43.
- 6.) Da ich von den Herren Tjpf im Jahre 1944 den Auftrag bekam 4 Stück Wohnhäuser (kleinere) auf ein außerhalb des Fabriks-Grundstückes, gelegenen Plan zu erstellen, bzw. die Bauleitung zu übernehmen so waren mit Herrn Braun viele Fragen zu erledigen.
- a) Gestellung der zum Bau erforderlichen Gerüste.
 - b) Hergabe von Fabriks-Maurer und Helfer u. Tischler.
 - c) Welche Vorrats-Materialien können vom Werk entnommen werden.
 - d) Gestellung von Fuhrwerken zur Anfuhr der Materialien auf die Baustelle.
 - e) Über die Verpflegung der auf der Baustelle beschäftigten Arbeiter von der Werksküche aus.
